Hadith studies in the title of this book refer mainly to hadith methodology and criteria that seek to verify accuracy of the text and authenticity of hadith. My treatment of the hadith and its methodology is somewhat selective and does not propose to cover all of the numerous areas of this discipline; it does, nevertheless, attempt to cover most of the important headings of hadith studies, commonly known as ulum al-hadith. A great deal of what is presented in this book is concerned with the methods of enquiry and principles which the hadith scholars have formulated for verifying the authenticity of hadith and accuracy of its message. “Jurisprudence of hadith” might be said to be an equally acceptable equivalent in English of ulum al-hadith, which is, however, not usually employed in the relevant literature.

One of the main objectives of methodology, whether in the sphere of hadith or other disciplines of learning, is to develop objective and scientific standards of enquiry and research. The purpose is to ensure adequate safeguards against subjectivity and error that might compromise reliability of the results of that enquiry. Methodological guidelines are particularly important to areas of research that involve value judgement and personal preference of the researcher, and also commitment to certain hypotheses in research. Religion is one such area where development of objectivity and impartial methods are at once difficult and most valuable. Muslim jurists and ulama have developed elaborate methodologies for the authentication of hadith with the purpose precisely to enhance the scope of scientific objectivity in their conclusions. This they have done in full awareness that in no other branch of Islamic learning has there been as much distortion and forgery as in hadith.

Objective knowledge is that knowledge which is open to public verification, and this is held to be true, in the modern world, of impherical knowledge, which can be accessed and verified by the public. The Islamic perception of objectivity and objective knowledge tends to differ, however, in that access, experimentation and whether or not it is verifiable by most people are not the defining elements of objective knowledge, although they remain to be relevant. Objectivity in the Islamic context is measured by impartiality, universality and justice. Objective knowledge is thus knowledge that internalises these qualities. Impartiality, and justice in knowledge, as in many other domains of human achievements, are noble qualities and Islamic scholarship has been very much concerned with the cultivation and acquisition of these qualities. "Compared to many other civilizations," wrote Osman Bakar, "Islamic civilisation has been quite successful in manifesting these qualities in the different domains of knowledge."

In the area of comparative religion, for example, the degree of scientific objectivity attained by medieval Muslim scholarship, as demonstrated, for example, in al-Biruni's tenth-century study of the Indian religion, is yet to be surpassed. Bakar elaborated that an area of knowledge is not considered more objective, from the Islamic viewpoint, than any other simply because it is verifiable by a greater number of people. Objectivity in Islam is inseparable from the religious consciousness of tawhid. Being created in the image of God, man seeks to emulate the divine qualities of the Creator. To be objective is, in a sense, to emulate God. Man is capable of objectivity because of the endowment in his nature of the divine qualities of impartiality and justice. Thus, there is "an important conceptual relationship between scientific objectivity and religious consciousness." The Islamic intellectual tradition recognises many levels of objective truth. Physical, mathematical and metaphysical truths are objective in nature. Objectivity is also possible in non-impherical knowledge, such as in the religious, philosophical and metaphysical knowledge, precisely because man is endowed with the higher faculties of intellectual discernment, impartiality and justice.

Personal motives, sectarian bias, political, scholastic and theological factors had been known, from very early times, to have prompted misguided individuals to fabricate ḥadith in order to advance their particular and partisan objectives. We also note that the twentieth-century scholarship on ḥadith that has originated in the works of some orientalists is no less controversial in its sweeping generalisations that tend to further undermine the credibility of ḥadith.

Moved by an acute sense of responsibility and the desire to safeguard the Sunna of the Prophet, peace be on him, against prejudice and error, the 'ulamā’ have undertaken painstaking efforts to verify the authenticity of ḥadith. Their tireless travelling and interviews, on a massive scale, for that purpose enabled them not only to obtain information on ḥadith, but also impressed upon them the difficulty of the challenge they faced over the endless possibilities of error in the accurate rendering of ḥadith. The methodology of ḥadith, or ʿusūl al-hadīth, that was developed as a result plays a roughly similar role in relation to ḥadith as that of the ʿusūl al-fiqh in relation to fiqh. The principal objective of both the ʿusūl al-fiqh and ʿusūl al-hadīth was to provide a set of methodological guidelines that ensured propriety in the exercise, in the case of ʿusūl al-fiqh, of legal reasoning and iqtiḥād, and in relation to ḥadith, to ensure authenticity in the text and transmission of ḥadith.

ʿUsūl al-fiqh and ʿusūl al-hadīth also overlap to some extent, with reference especially to the study of Sunna and ḥadith, which is a common theme in both these disciplines. It is of interest to note that the origins of ʿusūl al-hadīth are traced back to al-Shāfīʿī (150-205 AH), who is also known as the chief architect of ʿusūl al-fiqh. The solitary ḥadīth, or al-khabar al-māḥid, was a major theme of al-Shāfīʿī’s pioneering work on ʿusūl al-fiqh, the Risāla, which has by common acknowledgement earned him the epithet, ‘Nāṣir al-Sunna’, the champion of Sunna. Yet it seems that neither al-Shāfīʿī’s initial work on ḥadīth, nor the methodology of ʿusūl al-fiqh as a whole, were enough to finally tackle the problem over the authenticity of ḥadīth. The ḥadīth apparently represented a special case, and a separate methodology for it was needed to address issues that could not be adequately dealt with within the framework of ʿusūl al-fiqh. We do not have, for instance, a separate methodological discipline such as ʿusūl al-Qurʾān, and what we have by way of methodology in ʿusūl al-fiqh that relates to the Qurʾān is deemed to be sufficient. There was no pressing need for any elaborate methodology concerning the Qurʾān, due evidently to the undisputed authenticity of the text of the Qurʾān. Had there been accurate documentation of hadith, as there is of the Qurʾān, there would have been little reason for a separate discipline in the name of ʿusūl al-ḥadīth, and ʿusūl al-ḥiqāyah would have presumably been sufficient for what it offered by way of methodology on the Sunna.

It seems that methodology operates best at a level of generalisation which entails a certain disassociation with particularity and individualised detail. This is perhaps a weakness of methodology in reference especially to social sciences and religion. A total preoccupation with objectivity and scientific method may prove to be a weakness of methodology in these areas. One can imagine, for example, that one may apply the rules of ʿusūl al-ḥadīth and disqualify a ḥadīth that may well be authentic. Conversely, it would also seem possible to authenticate a ḥadīth on grounds of methodology that may, upon specific inquiry and research, prove to be spurious. The advice of caution that this analysis conveys is that one should not expect impervious results through the application of a certain methodology to ḥadīth. This is another way of saying, perhaps, that the development of even a separate and a fairly rich discipline of ʿulūm al-ḥadīth has not eliminated all doubt over the question of authenticity in ḥadīth. This may also explain perhaps as to why we find the methodological rules of ʿulūm al-ḥadīth to be laden with subsidiary and exceptional rules, which might have been designed to make up for the possible weaknesses of the methodology they were applying. Is this not reflected in the fact, for instance, that the ʿulūm al-ḥadīth consist of over fifty, and according to some estimates, close to a hundred separate branches of learning? Some ʿulamaʾ have attempted to refer to all of these under the consolidated term, ʿilm ʿusūl al-ḥadīth, or simply ʿusūl al-ḥadīth, that is, the jurisprudence of ḥadīth. Sometimes musštalah al-ḥadīth, and ʿilm dirāyāt al-ḥadīth are used as equivalent terms. Yet many of the leading writers on the subject such as al-Ḥakim al-Nīṣābūrī (d. 405 H), Maʿrifat ʿUlūm al-Ḥadīth, and Abū ʿAmr ʿUthmān b. ʿAbd al-Rahmān b. al-Ṣalāḥ’s (d. 643 H) ʿUlūm al-Ḥadīth have retained in these terms the pluralist feature of the ḥadīth sciences. Some ʿulamaʾ of the later ages, such as Jalāl al-Dīn al-Suyūṭī (d. 911 H), have preferred the term ʿilm dirāyāt al-ḥadīth. ʿUsūl al-ḥadīth is concerned with reliability of the narrators of ḥadīth and the subject matter of their narration, and evaluates their strengths and weaknesses to determine the authenticity of a reported hadith as being the true utterance of the Prophet. The upright character and retentiveness of the narrator and the authenticity at every link of the chain of isnād are the main focus of the scrutiny that is proposed by the methodology of usūl al-ḥadīth.

Unlike the usūl al-fiqh, which is consolidated well enough to be commonly recognised as the legal theory of the sources, the ʿulūm al-ḥadīth is itemised and diverse – as if the ʿulamā’ have tried to combine the two conflicting needs of an objective methodology, which was provided, but then had to be sub-divided into as many divisions as pragmatism and concern for particularity might have dictated. This has, in my opinion, added to the resourcefulness of ʿulūm al-ḥadīth, although at the expense, perhaps, of some compromise on consolidation. My overview of the methodology of hadith in the following pages will hopefully show that we are not really short of an adequate methodology for hadith, but there may be uncertainties as to whether it was developed early enough in time and was actually employed in a holistic manner to deliver its desired results. The present study does not seek to address every aspect of the methodology of ʿulūm al-ḥadīth, but attempts instead to present its most important features.

I begin this presentation with the reception and delivery (taḥammul waʿadā) of hadith, to be followed in the succeeding two sections by the compilation of hadith and methods that were employed in the documentation of hadith from early times. Section four expounds hadith literature and introduces the major hadith collections, which is followed in turn by a discussion of the biographies of hadith transmitters (ʿilm tārīkh al-rumāt), and then a section on hadith terminology, or muṣṭalāḥ al-ḥadīth. Section seven addresses the subject of forgery in hadith (wudʿal-ḥadīth), which is followed, in the next section, by impugnation and validation (al-jarḥ waʿl-taḥdīl). This last is mainly concerned with hadith criticism and methods that the ʿulamā’ have applied to expose weaknesses in both the transmission and subject matter of hadith. The discussion over the criticism of hadith is then continued, in sections nine and ten, under the two separate headings of ʿilal al-ḥadīth (hidden defects of hadith) and ṭadīl (concealment). The fairly detailed discussion of these two themes that is attempted fits in well with the main purpose of this study, which is to provide some insight into how the ‘ulamā’ have developed their resources in order to preserve and safeguard the authenticity of ḥadith. This is followed in the next four sections by mukhtalif al-ḥadīth (conflict in ḥadīth), ‘ilm ghārīb al-ḥadīth (unfamiliar expressions in ḥadīth), al-nūsikh wa’l-mansūkh fi’l-ḥadīth (the abrogator and abrogated in ḥadīth), and ziyādāt al-thiqāt (additions to ḥadīth by reliable narrators), respectively.

Sections fifteen to eighteen expound the various classifications of ḥadīth. The discussion here looks into classification of ḥadīth into the three categories of Sound (Ṣāhiḥ), Fair (Ḥasan), and Weak (Da‘if), the criteria of this classification, and how it relates to other classifications of ḥadīth which are reviewed in the succeeding two sections. The next chapter addresses the subject of confirmation and follow-up (al-Mutūbī wa’l-Shāhid) especially of ahādīth (pl. of ḥadīth) that are transmitted by a single narrator and in need therefore of confirmation in order to be accepted. This is followed in the succeeding section by the prerequisites of authenticity that must be met by every ḥadīth that constitutes a valid basis of judgement. The discussion here reviews qualifications of the narrators of ḥadīth, conditions that must be fulfilled by a valid chain of transmission (ismād) and those that must be met by the text (main) of ḥadīth. The book ends with a conclusion and a review of modern reformist opinion on some new projects that need to be undertaken in order to purify the existing ḥadīth literature from doubtful and unwarranted accretions.

‘Ulūm al-ḥadīth is basically concerned with methods and principles that ascertain the conditions of transmission and text (ṣanūd wa main) of ḥadīth from the two perspectives of narration (rimāya) and meaning (dirāya). The former is concerned with ensuring authenticity at the source and accuracy in the transmission and reporting of ḥadīth so as to prevent distortion and error, deliberate or otherwise, in ḥadīth transmission. The ‘ilm al-dirāya is chiefly concerned, on the other hand, with the accuracy of the text of ḥadīth by paying attention to all the nuances of the language and purpose of the text as well as any ruling it might contain. There is a greater scope in this part for the jurist and faqīh in regard to the deduction of the rules of Shari‘a from the language of ḥadīth, whereas the ‘ilm al-rimāya may be said to be the concern mainly of the traditionist, or muḥaddith. Yet these two aspects of the ḥadīth sciences cannot be meaningfully separated from one another. Both are equally important in gaining knowledge of the Sunna and the rules of Shari'a that it contains. Some of the branches of 'ulūm al-ḥadīth that are concerned mainly with the transmission (riwāya) and look more into the isnād are ‘ilm tārikh al-ruwāt (biographies), ‘ilm al-jārīh wa'l-ta'dil (impugnment and validation), confirmation and follow-up (al-mutābī wa'l-shāhid) and branches that focus on the exact identification of the narrator. Four other branches of ḥadīth sciences that relate more closely to the text or matn of ḥadīth are ‘ilm gharib al-ḥadīth (unfamiliar expressions in ḥadīth), ‘ilm mukhtalif al-ḥadīth (conflict in ḥadīth), additional segments in ḥadīth (zayādāt al-thiqāt) and ‘ilm al-nāṣikh wa'l-mansūkh (abrogation in ḥadīth). Certain other branches of ḥadīth such as ‘idal al-ḥadīth and tadlīs (subtle defects in ḥadīth) may equally relate to transmission and text.

Most of the numerous branches of ‘ulūm al-ḥadīth are basically concerned with the precise identification of the narrators of ḥadīth and draw attention to the endless possibilities of error that can occur in the isnād or the matn of ḥadīth. I do not propose to give a detailed account of all of these but merely to provide an inkling thereof and then move on to focus on our selected topics.

A branch of the ḥadīth studies is thus entitled as knowledge of the localities and domicile of ḥadīth narrators (maʿrifat awtān al-ruwāt wa'ul-hudānihi) and stresses the theme that identifying the place of residence, village and town wherein the particular narrator has lived and the exact place where he received the ḥadīth from his immediate source enhances the reliability of isnād. The first two generations of narrators of ḥadīth, namely the Companions (Ṣaḥāba), and the Followers (Tābi'in), are each the subject of a separate branch of ḥadīth sciences, known as maʿrifat al-ṣaḥāba, and maʿrifat al-tābi'in, and a third branch focuses on the senior and junior figures, namely, maʿrifat al-akābir min al-aṣāghir in every generation. Some ḥadīth narrators are known by different names and this can give rise to error and confusion; hence a branch of ḥadīth sciences is devoted exclusively to the knowledge of those who are known by different names (maʿrifat min dhukira bi-asmaʾ mukhtalifā). This is not just a function of the fact that Arabic names often consist of long series of attributions to father, son, mother, etc., but also that pen-names, nicknames and appellations were sometimes used by those who might have known the individual narrator by any of his other attributes or names.\(^5\)

Another branch of ḥadith sciences, known as ma'rifat al-mu'talif wa'l-mukhtalif min al-asma' wa'l-ansāb (knowledge of the look-alike but different names and genealogies) discusses names which are written similarly but pronounced differently. There are numerous names of this type, so much so that some have written individual works on the subject. Names such as Salām and Sallām, 'Umāra and 'Imāra, Kurayz and Karīz, Safr and Safar, etc., are written similarly in the Arabic script and text which may or may not provide the vowelling and declensions of words; and most often they are not given, hence the possibility of confusion of one name or narrator for another.\(^6\) Resembling this last branch of ḥadith sciences, there is yet another branch of ḥadith which addresses ḥadith narrators that had identical names and could easily be confused with one another. There were, for example, no less than six ḥadith narrators by the name Khalil ibn Ahmad, and four Ahmad b. Ja'far b. Hamdān, all of whom lived in the same generation, and many other cases of this kind. These have been isolated and identified by reference to other indicators such as the father's name, locality, teachers and disciples of the narrator in question, etc. This branch of ḥadith studies is known as ma'rifat al-muttaṣara'īq wa'l-muṣāriq min al-asma' wa'l-ansāb, on which al-Khaṭib al-Baghdādī has written a book bearing the title Al-Muttaṣara'īq wa'l-Muṣāriq (concordant and discordant). A still related area of ḥadith studies is known as ma'rifat al-muhhamat (knowledge of the obscure) and it is devoted to clarifying obscure references to individuals that occur in some aḥādīth. Phrases such as “a man asked the Prophet” or “a woman asked a question ...” are ambiguous, but the individuals involved have often been identified by the researchers.\(^7\) Instances have also been noted in ḥadith of names which are not as they might appear to be, and ḥadith scholars have often supplied the explanation so as to prevent confusion. For example Abū Mas'ūd al-Badrī 'Uqba b. 'Amr is a Companion who has actually not witnessed nor participated in the Battle of Badr, as the name might suggest. Sulaymān b. Ṭārkhān al-Taymi is not a member of the Taym tribe although the name might suggest so. This kind of information on ḥadith transmitters is studied in ma'rifat al-ansāb al-latī bātinahā 'ala khilāf zāhirahā (knowledge of genealogies whose appearance is contrary to what they actually are).\(^8\)
Although the genesis of 'uṣūm al-ḥadīth can historically be traced to the Prophetic period, it is basically after that period, that is, after the demise of the Prophet, peace be upon him, when his followers began to verify, collect, and compile his sayings and reports of his activities. The purpose naturally was accurate recording, retention and transmission of the Sunna of the Prophet. It is quite normal in this pattern of development to expect that collection and documentation of ḥadīth preceded the development of methodology for its authentication. For rules of methodology and procedure often emerge long after the subject matter which they seek to regulate. The rudiments of the methodology of ḥadīth were initially practised by the Companions and Followers without any attempt on their part to articulate them, and it was scholars of the subsequent generations that formulated the methods of admissibility of ḥadīth transmission and criteria that were to be met by the transmitters. These early inroads in ḥadīth methodology were enriched through the cumulative efforts of generations of scholars until it became an independent field and discipline of Islamic learning.

The 'ulamā' paid more attention to the development of methodology and reliability of ḥadīth transmitters after the incidence of political turmoil (fitna) in the community. Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhri's (d. 120 H) work provided wider scope for ḥadīth methodology and Imām al-Shāfi‘i (d. 205) paid more attention to it in his major works Al-Risāla and Al-Umm. But major developments in ḥadīth methodology took place in the third century and ‘Ali al-Madini (d. 233) was the first to write on the subject. But even so, writing on uṣūl al-ḥadīth was piecemeal and rudimentary during much of the third century. They were less than comprehensive and did not address all aspects of ḥadīth methodology. The main focus continued to be on documentation of ḥadīth while leading compilers of ḥadīth also addressed methodological issues such as Imām Muslim in the introductory section of his Saḥīḥ Muslim, and al-Tirmidhī in the concluding part of his Sunan al-Tirmidhī. Al-Bukhārī and al-Nasā‘i wrote separate works each bearing the title Kitāb al-Du‘ā’afā‘ that discussed weak and unreliable transmitters. Ibn Sa‘d’s (d. 230 H) Kitāb al-Tabaqāt al-Kabīrā provided much detail on biographies of ḥadīth transmitters and a more specialised work on this was later written by Abū Ḥātim b. Hibbān al-Bustī (d. 354) bearing the title Kitāb al-Tabaqāt in which he only discussed the most reliable transmitters (al-thiqāt). These works are known to have laid down basic methodological guidelines on reliable and spurious hadith. The methodological contents of these works were later isolated, enhanced and consolidated in more specialised works by the ‘ulamā’ of the fourth century. Thus came the work of al-Qādi Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥasan al-Rāmīrūnūzī (d. 360 H), Al-Muḥdith al-Fāṣil Bayn al-Rāmī wa’l-Wā’ī, which consolidated much of the development hitherto achieved in hadith methodology, but it still fell short, as Ibn Ḥajar al-‘Asqalānī (d. 852 H) later observed, of addressing all aspects of usūl al-ḥadīth. The main feature of this work was to bring together and consolidate aspects of usūl al-ḥadīth which were individually addressed before. The next landmark work was that of al-Ḥakīm Abū ‘Abd Allāh al-Nisābūrī (d. 405 H), Ma‘rījat ‘Ulim al-Ḥadīth which was comprehensive and discussed some fifty branches of hadith sciences, and yet according to Ibn Ḥajar al-‘Asqalānī, it is poorly consolidated and less than all-inclusive. Then came the two works of al-Khaṭīb Abū Bakr al-Baghdādī (d. 463 H), entitled Al-Kifāya fi Ma‘rifat Usūl ‘Ilm al-Riwāya, and Al-Jāmi‘ li-Ādāb al-Shaykh wa’l-Sāmi‘ on the correct methods of hadith narration, and then many more works to follow. Abū ‘Amr ʿUthmān b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Shahrazūrī’s, also known as Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ (d. 643 H) ‘Ulim al-Ḥadīth has been widely acclaimed and has remained a work of reference on the subject. ʿImād al-Dīn Ismāʿil Ibn Kathīr’s (d. 774 H) Al-Bāʾith al-Ḥadīth ilā Ma‘rifat ‘Ulim al-Ḥadīth is another work of repute on the subject, which has in many ways supplemented and taken a step further the work of his predecessor, Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ. Some aspects of usūl al-ḥadīth that were of obvious importance to the subject, such as the science of impugnment and validation (‘ilm al-jarh wa’ta’dil) were addressed at an early stage by leading figures such as Yahyā b. Maʿīn (d. 233 H) and Imām Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal (d. 241 H) and others, as will later be elaborated in the relevant parts of this work. Our study of ʿulūm al-Ḥadīth may thus begin with introductory information on the reception and delivery (taḥammul maʿ adā’) of hadith as follows.
Reception (Taḥammul) and Delivery (Adā') of Ḥadīth

IT is reported that the Prophet used to speak to his audience clearly and elaborated or repeated his point whenever he doubted the reception and understanding of his audience. Sometimes he asked his Companions to repeat his message, or he asked them a question to alert them as to the accuracy of their reception. 'Ā'isha al-Śiddīqa has been quoted to have said that “the Prophet, peace be on him, did not summarise his speech ... and he spoke in a way that if one were to count his words, they could be counted.” She has also been quoted to the effect that “whenever she did not hear anything (that the Prophet had said) she went back over it until she clarified and understood it.”

A纳斯 Ibn Mālik has also been quoted to have said that “when the Prophet gave salām (greeting) to anyone he (often) said it three times and when he spoke a word he repeated it three times until it was understood.”

The Prophet did not, however, expatiate in speech and did not speak without need, but when he spoke, according to reports, he used the whole of his mouth rather than lips only. He would diversify his theme so as to keep the interest of his audience. He also conveyed his purpose sometimes through practical illustration. His Companions saw themselves as recipients of his teachings and carriers of his message. To this effect 'Abd Allāh b. Mas'ūd is quoted to have said that “when a man from among us was taught ten verses (ṣūrat) of the Qur'ān, he did not go further until he understood their meaning and manner of action upon them.” The Companions were also noted for their eagerness to be present in the Prophet's company and learn from him. 'Umar b.
al-Khaṭṭāb thus went on record to say that “I and a neighbour of mine from Banū Ummaya: b. Zayd used to take turns in attending sessions with the Messenger of God. He would attend one day and I the next and then we informed one another of the events of the day and any new revelation that might have been communicated.”

Hadith scholars have specified certain conditions that must be met by anyone who receives and carries the ḥadīth and then delivers and transmits it to others. These conditions are basically concerned with the legal capacity of the receivers and transmitters of ḥadīth.

One who receives the ḥadīth must be a discerning person who has attained an age that enables him to listen to and retain the ḥadīth and convey it to others. The precise age is a subject of disagreement but the legal capacity of a receiver of ḥadīth is known to be different to legal capacity for purposes of civil and commercial transactions. A discerning child of seven, and according to some, five, years of age may not be capable of concluding a transaction or contract and yet may be able to comprehend what he hears and retain it or even transmit it to others. Many have specified that the child should be able to understand speech addressed to him and be able to give an answer. The child in question may write what he hears or may not and the ‘ulamā‘ have not specified any particular age for purposes of writing.

The Companions and others have thus accepted the ḥadīth transmitted by Maḥmūd b. al-Rabī‘ who said:

When I was a boy of five, I remember, the Prophet, peace be on him, took water from a bucket (used for drawing water out of a well) with his mouth and threw it on my face.

The question as to whether a disbeliever (kāfir) is qualified to be a recipient and carrier of ḥadīth is answered in the affirmative provided that he is a Muslim when he transmits the ḥadīth to others. A kāfir is thus qualified to receive ḥadīth but not to transmit it. To accept ḥadīth transmitted by a disbeliever would mean that Muslims are bound by his report that consequently becomes a part of their religion, which is unacceptable.

One who transmits ḥadīth must also be a person of just character (‘adl). Possession of just character or ‘adāla, although often linked with observance of religious duties, avoidance of major sins, some particularly degrading minor sins or even profanities that are not necessarily sinful yet degrading, such as the company of corrupt persons, indulgence in demeaning jokes, etc. Yet ‘adāla is a holistic attribute of character which inspires confidence in the truth, uprightness and reliability of a person. This is a question of integrity, honesty and taqwā that people are often known either to have it or not.

And lastly the transmitter of hadith must have a retentive memory (al-ğabh) which means that he was alert and attentive when receiving the hadith and retained it with due diligence as to its accuracy from the time of reception until delivery and transmission. A person of sound memory that is able, with or without the aid of writing, to ensure the integrity of hadith against error, distortion and change is usually qualified as retentive (ğabh). The quality of retentiveness is also known by virtue of the fact that a person’s speech is in agreement with the work of those who are known to be upright and retentive. An occasional discrepancy or disagreement is of no consequence provided that the general calibre and purpose of one’s work is agreeable when compared to the works of recognised and reliable transmitters. If instances of conflict and discordance are frequent, the quality of ğabh will be difficult to establish.

Transmission of hadith is consequently not accepted from a person who fails to fulfil the five conditions of adā which are Islam, majority, sound intellect, just character and retentiveness – whereas there is basically one precondition of reception (taḥammul) which is intellectual discernment (al-tamyiẓ). We now turn to the methods of reception (taḥammul) and those of delivery (adā) of hadith which are separately discussed as follows.

Methods of Reception (al-‘Akhdh wa’l-Taḥammul)

The transmitter of hadith is likely to have received the hadith in any of the following ways which the hadith scholars have identified in an order of decreasing scale of reliability. But before reviewing these methods, it should be noted that they were applicable in earlier times, that is before the documentation of hadith in reliable collections by such scholars as al-Bukhārī and Muslim. The methods of receiving hadith that are discussed below effectively ceased to apply after the compilation of ṣaḥḥaḥ al-sīna, the six sound collections of ḥadīth. Nowadays we simply receive the ḥadīth through the written records of ḥadīth by learned men who made the effort of verifying and recording the ḥadīth with diligence and care to ensure that they only recorded ḥadīth from transmitters whom they verified as upright and reliable. Ever since the availability of these highly acclaimed collections, scholars and students in search of ḥadīth simply locate the ḥadīth in these sources and refer to it, and they do not, on the whole, need to verify reliability of the chain of transmission and text of the ḥadīth, nor do they need normally to refer to the various other aspects of the ḥadīth methodology. But this facility was not available prior to the compilation of the major collections of ḥadīth. Because of the existence, in early times, of doubtful and fabricated matter into the general body of ḥadīth, transmitters of ḥadīth were required to specify as to how exactly did they receive it themselves. Was it through direct hearing (al-samā’), which is regarded to be the most reliable of all methods, or some other manner of reception? This information was necessary for the scholars of ḥadīth to enable them to evaluate the grades of reliability of the ḥadīth they were recording in their collections. The eight methods of reception that are known to ḥadīth methodology are as follows.

1. Direct hearing (al-Samā’): The recipient of ḥadīth according to this method has received the ḥadīth through direct hearing of the ḥadīth from a teacher, or a shaykh, who has recited it either from memory or from a written record. The teacher in this case is most likely to be someone in the generations following that of the Companions, simply because ḥadīth verification and transmission through accurate recitation and recording actually started after that time. When a Companion narrated ḥadīth from the Prophet, he or she was not normally faced with the question of how he or she actually received it from the Prophet. Although the question is not irrelevant and even the Companions have often indicated the occasion or context in which they heard the Prophet saying something or approving a particular act or conduct, since there were basically no intermediate links or contacts involved, questions were not asked as to the manner of tahlīl and adā’ (reception and delivery) of ḥadīth. These methods were identified basically through the development of ḥadīth scholarship and emergence of learned men of hadith who taught hadith to a circle of disciples and it was through this teaching that the disciples became qualified to transmit the hadith down the line of isnād. The disciple who received the hadith may have heard and written it down at the time of hearing, or wrote it afterwards. If he was the only one present, he would be likely to transmit the hadith by the word sami’tu (I heard so and so ...) or haddathanā (so and so spoke to me), or akhbaranā or anba’ānī (so and so informed me). Direct hearing when indicated by the use of these expressions ranks highest on the scale of reliability as it inspires confidence in the accuracy of the message that was received in the first place. If there were more people present, or when the disciple was in a group of other disciples, he would be in a position to use the plural form of these terms in each case by saying, for example, that ‘we heard’, ‘it was reported to us’, ‘we were informed’ (sami’nā, haddathanā, akhbaranā, anba’ānā) and so forth. The hadith scholars usually required the transmitter not to use the plural term if he heard it alone from his teacher and to specify carefully if the use of the plural term was justified, and also to mention those who heard it together with him.¹⁹

According to a variant opinion, the plural terms haddathanā and akhbaranā are in a sense preferable to sami’tu in that they convey a deliberate and purposeful address whereas sami’tu does not integrate that sense of deliberate address by the teacher to the disciple. Be that as it may, direct hearing in the singular is still considered stronger. Sometimes familiarity and practice may take the place of some verbal expressions. Most of the reports from Ibn Jurayj, for instance, simply quote him by the expression ‘nāla Ibn Jurayj’ (Ibn Jurayj said) as it was known of Ibn Jurayj that he did not narrate anything without directly hearing it himself in the first place.¹⁹

2. Recitation or Rehearsal (al-Qirā’a ‘ala’l-Shaykh). The disciple in this case reads back to the shaykh, from memory or record, the hadith which he has known from his shaykh or someone else, and wants the shaykh to verify its accuracy. This method, which is also known as al-’ard, requires that the reader comprehends what he reads and the shaykh is alert and awake so as to be able to spot any error or distortion in the rehearsal. The disciple who then transmits the hadith is likely to use a phrase such as ‘I read to the shaykh who was listening’ (qara’tu `alā ’l-shaykh wa huwa yasma’u) or if someone else from those present reports it, he may say ‘this was read to the shaykh who was listening’ (qur’i’a `alā ’l-shaykh wa huwa yasma’u) or such similar expressions that must, however, indicate the element of recitation or qirā’a therein to distinguish it from al-samā’.¹¹

There is disagreement as to the relative strength of this method compared to direct hearing. According to an opinion which is attributed to Imām Abū Ḥanīfa, recitation is stronger than hearing as there is an element of repetition and endorsement therein. Imām Mālik has considered them to be equal and this is said to be the position generally of the scholars of Hijāz, and Kūfah including Imām al-Bukhārī. Having reviewed these variant views, Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ wrote that the correct position is that direct hearing still remains the stronger of the two methods.¹²

As for the actual terms used by the disciple, the clearest expression to convey qirā’a is “qara’tu `alā fulān” (I read this to so and so) or if by a third party to say “qur’i’a `alā fulān wa anā asma’u” (this was read to so and so and I heard it). The question as to whether the words ‘ḥaddathānā’ and ‘akhirbaranā’ may be acceptable substitutes to rehearsal and recitation has received much attention. Some accept these as substitutes and others do not. There are also those who accept ‘akhirbaranā’ as a valid substitute but not ‘ḥaddathānā’. The ‘ulamā’ of hadith do not accept either as valid substitutes. Then it is stated that ‘akhirbaranā’ may be accepted as a valid substitute if the recipients are actually in the plural. It is also noted, rightly perhaps, that no recitation or qirā’a can be valid, whatever the terms, without direct hearing by the teacher who actually paid attention when his disciple was reciting the ḥadith to him.¹³

3. Permission (al-ijāza). This is when the teacher or shaykh grants permission to one or more persons to transmit from him ḥadith in a specified or unspecified context even without direct hearing or recitation. The ‘ulamā’ of ḥadith are known to have employed this method with their disciples and the ijāza so granted was equivalent to a licence that they gave; usually to persons they trusted. Of the various types of ijāza that are known to usūl al-ḥadith, two types are valid, and two have been rejected. The two valid forms of ijāza are firstly, permission granted to a specified person over something that is also specified; for instance, when a teacher or shaykh says to one of his distinguished disciples “I permit you to transmit from me the contents of this book, manuscript, or books,” which are so specified. Secondly, where permission is granted by a teacher to his trusted disciple to transmit from him hadīth on a subject or subjects which the teacher has not specified. The Arabic particle ‘an’ (from) which frequently appears in the isnād of many prophetic reports of ḥadīth is taken to actually mean a grant of permission to the narrator by his immediate source, or shaykh.14

The two types of ijāza that are invalid are, firstly, of a specified subject matter to an unspecified person or persons, when the teacher says, for instance, that “I permit the Muslims or the people of Madīna in respect of such and such”. Secondly, permission to unspecified persons concerning an unspecified subject matter. When the teacher says, for example, that “I permit anyone who wishes to report from me whatever I have said”. These expressions are deemed to be too vague to qualify as ijāza. As a method, ijāza is known to have been granted by teachers of hadīth to their trusted disciples over hadīth or hadīths which are specified individually rather than by collection or volume.15

Hadīth scholars have debated the basic validity of ijāza and many in the Shāfi’i school, including the Imām himself and Abū’l-Ḥasan al-Māwardī do not consider it as a valid method. It is thus said to be invalid to narrate a hadīth which has not been heard from the teacher and shaykh, who merely grants permission without actually pronouncing the subject matter of that permission. It is like the teacher telling his disciple that “I permit you to narrate from me what you have not heard,” which should be avoided.16 The general position on this, however, remains to be affirmative provided that there is adequate communication between the teacher and disciple. Some ʿulamāʾ, such as the Mālikī jurist Abū’l-Walīd al-Bājī, have gone so far as saying that there is general consensus (ijmāʿ) on the basic validity of ijāza.17

Certain other types of ijāza have also been held to be invalid and this includes ijāza granted to a child, and to a person who does not exist. This is because ijāza is in the nature of wakāla (agency) which requires that the wakīl be a competent person and a child does not qualify. Similarly, if a ḥadīth teacher addresses someone in such terms that “I grant you and your children and grandchildren that may come after you permission to narrate from me ...” since this type of ijāza concerns a person who is yet to be born the correct view here is that it is null and void. If ijāza is in the nature of wakāla, it is necessary that the wakīl is a living person and also competent to be a wakīl. No ijāza is therefore valid to a non-existing person. Imām Mālik is reported to have said that ijāza is not valid unless the person to whom it is granted is skillful and that the subject matter of ijāza is also clearly identified. To this Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ adds that the teacher should actually grant it in his words and not simply in writing. Ijāza in writing is still valid but weaker than the one that is accompanied by verbal pronouncement.16

4. Presentation (al-Munāwala). This is when the teacher/shaykh presents to his disciple his own manuscript and record of what he himself has originally received from his source and tells him that “these are what I have heard or received from so and so.” This may be combined with permission (ijāza) for the disciple to transmit what the teacher gives him. The teacher may thus add “you may narrate it from me, or I grant you permission to narrate it from me.” Sometimes it is the disciple who places in the hands of his shaykh a collection of what his shaykh has actually taught him and the shaykh verifies it to be correct, and returns it and grants him permission to narrate it. This is sometimes known as ‘ard al-munāwala. Munāwala that is accompanied by ijāza is regarded to be superior than the one where the teacher has not specified his permission, although both forms have in principle been validated.19 Verification by the teacher is important and absence thereof vitiates the munāwala. Thus if a disciple approaches his teacher and shows him a book in two covers, saying that “this is based on your teaching and I seek your permission for me to narrate it,” and the teacher then replies in the affirmative without actually verifying the contents of the work – this is not valid unless the disciple is a trusted and qualified person and the teacher acts from a position of confidence and trust.20 Some ʿulamāʾ have also disputed the validity of a munāwala which is not accompanied by a grant of permission, or ijāza, saying that it remains doubtful and does not validate narration of hadith. Although munāwala without ījāza is regarded as a weak form of munāwala, the position still remains that it does provide a valid basis for narration of hadith especially when there is a relationship of trust between the teacher and disciple.

5. Correspondence (al-Mukātaba). This is when the hadith teacher writes the hadith in his own handwriting, or asks someone else to write it, and then hands it over or sends it personally to his disciple with approval for the latter to transmit what the teacher wrote. This may or may not be accompanied with permission. The former variety is more reliable but the latter is also accepted. When there is permission and hand-over of written hadith, it is equivalent to munāwala. It is also preferable that the written material is in the teacher’s own handwriting, and if it is written by someone else the teacher should specify to the effect that his message was conveyed in so and so’s handwriting. One often finds instances of mukātaba in the writings of hadith scholars to the effect that “so and so wrote to me, or informed me ...”. When this is said, it is most likely to be espoused with permission, even if the word permission or ījāza is not explicitly employed.

Critics have expressed reservations, however, in saying that the handwriting of one person sometimes resembles that of another and mukātaba should not therefore be seen as a reliable method of hadith transmission. But this is considered to be a weak opinion and generally it is said that confusion due to close resemblance is not expected to be frequent. Some have even held, and rightly so, that mukātaba which is accompanied by permission is equivalent to munāwala that is accompanied by permission, and that it is one of the most reliable methods of reception and transmission of hadith.21

6. Declaration (al-I‘lām). This is when the teacher merely declares to his disciple that “this hadith or collection thereof is what I have heard from so and so, or I received it from so and so” without saying anything as to grant of permission for the disciple to transmit it. But even so, it is said that permission of this nature is implied in the declaration and the disciple is consequently allowed to transmit it to others. He may not, however, transmit in the event where the teacher specifically asks him not to transmit it. Thus if the teacher declares to his disciple what he has received from a valid source and then asks him in the meantime not to transmit it, he should not transmit. According to a variant opinion, however, the disciple may transmit it nevertheless. This opinion is based on an analogy between ḥadith reporting (riwāya) and testimony (shahāda). Once a witness declares something, he can no longer control, allow or disallow others as to whether they transmit it or not. In response to this it is said that testimony is given in a court or a judicial tribunal (majlis al-ḥukm) and it differs from ḥadith reporting in this respect. The ḥadith teacher can, in other words, disallow his disciple from transmitting what he has declared to him.21

7. Bequest (al-Wasīyya). This is rather a rare method of ḥadith transmission. What it obviously means is that a ḥadith teacher leaves instructions upon departing on a journey or at the time of death addressed to someone asking him to transmit the contents of a particular collection or book from him. This is the weakest method of tahammul and many have advised against its admissibility. There is a difference, however, between this and a simple bequest of a book to someone which is not accompanied by permission to transmit its contents. For this would only transfer ownership of the book to the legatee, which is a different matter to ḥadith transmission. It is as if to say that when the author bequests his book to someone, he does not necessarily assign his copyright to that person.21

8. Finding (al-Wijāda). This is where a person finds ḥadith in the handwriting of his teacher or under his instruction which he has not heard from his teacher. The one who has found the materials may then transmit them to others provided that he recognises the handwriting of his teacher, or when he is assured of the reliability of his finding. He may then speak about it and say, for example, that “I found this in so and so’s handwriting” or that “so and so said in his book ...” or something similar to that effect. The Musnad of Imām Ibn Ḥanbal contains many ḥadith reports which have been recorded by ‘Abd Allāh b. Ḥanbal in such words that “I found in my father’s handwriting ...” and then states the ḥadith in question. Thus it was only proper for him to say so and it would not have been correct if he transmitted ḥadith directly from his father, but to say that he found it in his father’s collection. Direct reporting in that situation would amount to a form of taddīs.¹⁹

As a method of tāḥammul, wijdā is rather rare in the works of the early writers and transmitters of ḥadīth and some 'ulamā' of ḥadīth and jurists of the Mālikī school have considered it impermissible to transmit ḥadīth on its basis. However, it is probably the most common form of tāḥammul now as it has been ever since the documentation on a large scale of ḥadīth in the third century hijra. Most people nowadays find a ḥadīth in one of the reliable collections and quote it while mentioning the source where they found the ḥadīth. This is possible partly due to the reliability of the major compilations of ḥadīth which are widely known as the best receptacles of ḥadīth from where to quote and transmit the ḥadīth by students and scholars alike.²²

In conclusion it may be said that ḥadīth transmitters are required to transmit ḥadīth in words that are indicative of the manner in which they received it. Thus, when the transmitter heard ḥadīth directly from his immediate source, he is expected to use words such as 'I heard, we heard' (sami’tu, sami’nā) and not, as it were, that so and so said (gāla), or 'mentioned to me' (dhakara ī) and the like, as these are vague and would cast doubt on the facts of direct hearing. It is also rare for ḥadīth teachers to use such particles as ‘ān’ (from him) in the case of direct hearing as it would cause confusion.

Similarly a transmitter who received the ḥadīth from his source through gīrā’ā (reading or rehearsal) should use words that convey his manner of reception such as 'I read this to so and so' or 'it was read to so and so while I was listening', or expressions which convey that purpose. Similarly when the transmitter has received the ḥadīth through munāwāla or iṣāza or correspondence, the words he uses in transmitting the ḥadīth should make a reference to them. It is even more important to mention the source where one finds the ḥadīth in the case of wijdā (finding) and avoid using terms that would cast doubt between this and other varieties of tāḥammul.²⁶
IT is generally known that the Prophet, peace be on him, discouraged documentation of his own sayings and Sunna at the early stages of his mission in order to preserve the purity of the Qur'ān and prevent the possibility of confusion between the Qur'ān and his Sunna. The Prophet is thus reported to have said to his Companions: "Do not write what I say. Anyone who has written from me anything other than the Qur'ān, let him blot it out. You may speak about me and there is no objection to that, but one who attributes a lie to me deliberately should prepare himself for a place in Hell."

لاكتتبوا عنى ومن كتب عنى غير القرآن فليمحمه. وحدثوا عنى ولاحرج. ومن كتب عنى متمعدا فليمحمه مقعدة من النار.

Many of the leading Companions including 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, 'Abd Allāh b. Mas‘ūd, Zayd b. Thābit, Abū Mūsā al-Ash‘ārī, and Abū Sa‘īd al-Khudrī were against the writing of hadith whereas 'Abd b. Abi Ṭālib, his son, al-Hasan, Anas b. Mālik, 'Abd Allāh b. Amr b. al-‘Āṣ considered it to be permissible. Some among this latter group also wrote what they heard of the Prophet's sayings for their own collections. There are also reports that during the latter part of his mission, that is, at a time when much of the Qur'ānic text had already been documented, the Prophet responded positively to the request of some of his Companions to write his sayings. By the time when most of the Qur'ān was received, memorised and documented, the Prophet permitted documentation of his Sunna and addressed the Companions to “preserve knowledge through writing.” He also employed the prisoners of war after the Battle of Badr to teach basic writing and literacy to the Muslim children and even accepted this as ransom for their eventual release. This also confirms that there were more writers in Makka than there were in Madina. Some have in fact noted that there was a severe shortage of writers in Madina. This may also explain the fact that the Masjid al-Nabī in Madīnah combined a mosque and a literacy school for early Muslims. Some commentators have drawn the conclusion that prohibition of the writing of ḥadīth was actually meant to prevent the writing of the Qur˒ān and the Sunna indistinguishably on the same page or collection but that writing was otherwise permitted if the two were clearly separated. There is also the opinion that the initial prohibition of writing the Sunna was subsequently set aside and abrogated by the Prophet himself. Some support for this can be found in the practice of the Companions who actually wrote ḥadīth with the explicit permission of the Prophet. This opinion has, however, been disputed by those who noted that the prohibitive position concerning the writing of ḥadīth was practised and observed by the Companions for quite a long time and it may therefore be inaccurate to say that it was abrogated. The more likely interpretation that can combine these various positions might therefore be that the original prohibition was the general (ʾāmm) ruling of ḥadīth and the permission that the Prophet subsequently granted to some of his Companions like Abū Shāh and ‘Abd Allāh b. ‘Amr. b. al-‘Āṣ was specific and given for particular reasons. Abū Shāh al-Yamānī was weak of memory but was eager to retain the ḥadīth so he told the Prophet about it and the Prophet replied “seek the help of your right hand”. ‘Abd Allāh was a literary figure who was well read in Arabic, had some knowledge of Assyrian, and was considered a reliable writer to document the sayings of the Prophet. The proponents of the view that there was an abrogation of the original ruling have added that after the initial period, the umma as a whole and the ‘ulama’ and jurists have unanimously accepted basic permissibility of writing the hadith. This is undoubtedly the position that has prevailed ever since and represents general consensus, or ijmā’, of the umma. It is established beyond doubt that there was a change of direction and whether one subsumes it under the umbrella of abrogation, particularisation, or of ijmā’, it probably does not make much difference. These positions are also ijtihād - oriented positions, which help to explain certain factual developments within the rubric of a juristic formula. The fact thus remains that documentation of ḥadīth became a major preoccupation of the 'ulamā' which they pursued as a form of service to Islam and a means of gaining the pleasure of God Most High. The view thus prevailed that memories are liable to forgetfulness and the possibility therefore of error and inaccuracy in ḥadīth was bound to increase without documentation. As time passed, the chains of īsnād became longer and details of names, places and dates therein became burdensome for anyone’s memory.

Commentators have often given the impression that there was very little documentation of the Sunna during the time of the Prophet and that of the Companions. There are also reports which suggest the opposite of this and maintain that documentation of ḥadīth during the lifetime of the Prophet was not as trifling or negligible as it is often assumed. Some of the reports on both sides may be less than conclusive. Yet the fact seems to be established beyond doubt that the writing of ḥadīth started during the lifetime of the Prophet, although not many of the early collections of ḥadīth have actually reached us. To reach a more accurate understanding of this, we need to review the relevant evidence.

Al-Tirmidhī has reported that the renowned Companion, Sa’d b. ‘Ubādah, who was a leading figure of the Anṣār in Madīna had in his possession a Ṣaḥīfa collection wherein he documented the sayings and Sunna of the Prophet, and that his son used to narrate hadīth from that Ṣaḥīfa. Al-Bukhārī has also reported that this same Ṣaḥīfa was later integrated into the collection of ḥadīth that another leading Companion, ‘Abd Allāh b. Abī Awaḍa, compiled in his own handwriting and the people used to read his manuscript and often verified its content with him.

Another Companion, Samura b. Junub (d. 60 H), is also noted to have documented ḥadīth in his own handwriting, which was later inherited by his son Sulaymān, who in turn reported ḥadīth from it. It is probably the same collection which came to the attention of Muḥammad b. Sirīn (d. 110 H) who said concerning it that “the epistle which Samura transferred to his son contained a great deal of knowledge.”
Another Companion, Jābir b. ʿAbd Allāh (d. 78 H), is also noted to have compiled a collection of ḥadith specifically on the subject of the ḥajj in which he also quoted the Prophet’s Farewell Sermon on the occasion of the last pilgrimage (ḥaḍījat al-wadāʾ). One of the leading tābiʿī, Qarāda b. Dīʿāma al-Sadūsī (d. 118 H), spoke highly of the Sahīfa of Jābir even to the extent to say that “I remember the Sahīfa of Jābir better than the sūra al-Baqara.” It is possible that ḥadith narrated by Sulaymān b. Qays al-Yashkūrī, who was a disciple of Jābir, were taken from the Sahīfa of Jābir. Jābir’s collection became well-known and it is very likely that some of his disciples copied and wrote some of it for their own collections, even though none of it has actually reached us.

One of the best known collection of ḥadith that was written during the Prophet’s lifetime was Al-Sahīfa al-Sādiqa (the true collection) by ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ (d. 65 H). It contained one thousand aḥādīth, and although the actual manuscript has not reached us, its contents have been quoted almost entirely in the Musnad of Imām Ahmad b. Hanbal. This has often been described as one of “the most reliable historical documents to prove the writing of ḥadith during the Prophet’s lifetime.” It is reported that ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ used to write everything the Prophet would say and he was consequently told by some people that he should not do so, which was why ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿAmr asked the Prophet for permission to write his sayings:

May I write all that I hear? The Prophet said “Yes”. When you are calm and when angry? To this the Prophet said “Yes, for even in that state I do not say anything but the truth”.

The encouraging tone of this ḥadith naturally bore fruit and ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿAmr became even more assiduous in what he was doing. This was also noted by his fellow Companion, Abū Hurayra, who is quoted to have said that “None of the Companions of the Prophet, peace be on him, has taken more hadith from him than myself, except for 'Abd Allah b. 'Amr who used to write, but I did not."

It is similarly reported that 'Ali b. Abi Talib wrote down the sayings of the Prophet. Abu Juwayfa has thus stated that "I asked 'Ali: Do you have anything written with you, and he said 'no', except for the Book of God ... or what is in this Sahifa. I asked: What is in this Sahifa then? He said: (It is about) blood money, release of war prisoners, and (the hadith to the effect) that 'a Muslim is not executed for killing a disbeliever'."

Another well-known document and probably the earliest on record was the constitution of Madina (dustur al-Madina, also known as sahihat al-Madina) which was written in the first year of the Hijra. This document is concerned mainly with relations among the three major groups of Madina, namely the Migrants, the Helpers and the Jews, which forged unity between them all and declared them as "one umma (community) to the exclusion of others." The document actually begins with the phrase "this is a document (kitab)" and that document which is spelled out in (47) articles has survived in its original form, and is sufficiently well known to be ranked as hadith mutamad.

Moreover, the prominent Companion, 'Abd Allah b. 'Abbâs (d. 69 H) wrote the sayings of the Prophet and his Sunna on plates (alwâh) which he used to carry to his teaching circles. One of his students, Sa'id b. Jubayr (d. 95 H) also wrote from his teacher, and in the course of time the collection of Ibn 'Abbâs became well-known and many of the hadith reports that Ibn 'Abbâs transmitted were based on his written records. Another prominent figure among the Companions, Anas b. Mâlik, is also reported to have documented hadith in a Sahifa which he used to carry with him and showed it to the people he met.

The Sahifa collection of Hammâm b. Munabbih (d. 101), a disciple of Abû Hurayra (d. 58 H) consists of hadith that Abû Hurayra narrated and has actually attributed it to his teacher. This collection, also known as al-sahifa ai-sahifa, has survived and has been documented by Muhammad Hamidallah from the two near-identical manuscripts that he obtained in Damascus and Berlin respectively. It has also been documented in the Musnad of Imâm Ahmad b. Hanbal. Subhi al-Sâlih has concluded, however, that Hammâm wrote the collection after the Prophet's demise as he was born in the year 40 Hijra and his teacher Abū Hurayra died in the year 58. Thus it is likely that Hammām’s collection was written around the mid-first century Hijra. This collection contains 138 ahādīth and is indicative of the high level of care and accuracy that Hammām gave to the content of the ḥadīth which he recorded. ʿṢubḥī al-Ṣāliḥ thus concluded from the evidence he has discussed that ḥadīth writing began at a very early stage, that is, during the Prophet’s lifetime, and not, as many orientalists have held, at the beginning of the second century Hijra.

Another contemporary author, ʿUmar Ḥāshim, has quoted Abūl-Ḥasan al-Nadwī and Aḥsan al-Kaylānī in support of his own conclusion that if these early collections of ḥadīth are put together they would comprise the greater part of the ahādīth that were subsequently compiled in the larger collections during the third century Hijra. The fact that only the subsequent collections became well-known is due largely to their superior methods of compilation. These later collections showed a distinct improvement, in terms of classification and consolidation of themes, over the earlier collections, which consisted of unclassified ahādīth that were simply put together. This situation is seen as a contributing factor to the orientalists’ assertion that ḥadīth began to be written and compiled only in the second century. Even the history books began to mention only leading works and compilations of the subsequent period and almost totally ignored the earlier collections.

Another factor that contributed to this misgiving is the somewhat exaggerated references by the authors of subsequent works to ḥadīth collections, citing figures in the order of hundreds of thousands of ḥadīths, which somehow overshadowed and miniscule the significance of the earlier collections. It is remarkable to hear that Imām Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal collected seven hundred thousand ahādīth, and similar figures are mentioned in conjunction with the works of the two leading scholars of ḥadīth, al-Bukhārī and Muslim. It may be that these figures consisted mainly of the number of reports and reporters rather than of actual ahādīth. For the ḥadīth ħumāmā’l-ʿāmīl bi-niyyāt alone has been transmitted through seven hundred channels. If we were to eliminate repetition and reduce all of this to the actual number of ḥadīth, we would have a much smaller number of ahādīth left, that may or may not exceed ten thousand in number.
The Caliph 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb considered the documentation of Sunna and consulted with the Companions, many of whom supported the idea, but as 'Urwa b. al-Zubayr reported “‘Umar delayed the matter and thought over it for a month as he remained doubtful about it himself”, but after a month of deliberation, he addressed the Companions and told them that he was apprehensive that this might distract people's attention from the Book of God. The Caliph 'Umar eventually decided not to write the Sunna. This position basically remained unchanged during the period of the Pious Caliphs until the advent of the turmoil and fitna which followed the assassination of the third Caliph 'Uthmān and the civil war that broke out between the Caliph 'Alī and the governor of al-Shām, Mu‘āwiya. Military conflict led in turn to the emergence of political and theological differences among various groups, and some individuals resorted to hadith forgery in order to promote their particular viewpoints.

With the subsequent expansion of the territorial domain of Islam and the travelling to remote places, or demise, of many of the Companions, concern gained ground once again for the documentation of hadith. Among the successors, the Umayyad Caliph, 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz (d. 101 H) was the first to take up the issue and assigned to the governor of Madīna, Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. Ḥazm (d. 117 H) the task to collect and document the Sunna of the Prophet, and to “accept nothing other than the hadith of the Prophet, peace be on him, and write therein the hadith of 'Amra b. ‘Abd al-Raḥmān al-Anṣāriyya (d. 98 H).” Reports also suggest that another learned man of hadith, al-Qāsim Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr (d. 107 H) was also asked by the Caliph to assist Ibn Ḥazm, but the Caliph passed away at this juncture and did not live long enough to see the fruits of his important initiative. Among those that the deceased Caliph had asked to document the Sunna was Muḥammad b. Muslim b. Shihāb al-Zuhri (d. 124 H) of Madīna, the teacher of Imām Mālik, who responded to the call and attempted what proved to be the first major collection of hadith, marking the early beginning of the extensive hadith collections that were later accomplished during the second and third centuries. Al-Zuhri's work was continued by scholars like Ibn Jurayj (d. 150) and Ibn Ishāq (d. 151) in Makka, Imām Mālik (d. 179) in Madīna, Abū 'Amr al-Awzā'ī (d. 157) in al-Shām, Sufyān al-Thawrī (d. 160) in Kūfa, Ḥammād b. Salama (d. 167) in Baṣra and the movement spread far and wide to the Yemen and Khurāsān.

Al-Zuhri’s method of writing was subject-oriented and consisted of a separate book each on Sunna pertaining to an individual subject, such as the ritual prayer (salāḥ), fasting and zakāḥ, etc., in which he also collected relevant data from the sayings of the Companions and the tābi‘ūn, without giving exclusive treatment to the ḥadith of the Prophet. He documented all that he had heard from the Companions. This manner of writing was generally followed by other writers on Sunna during the second century. The Muwatṭa‘ of Imām Mālik also conformed to this style of writing.²

Whereas the early years of the second century saw works on the Sunna that were in conformity with al-Zuhri’s method, the latter part of that century witnessed writings in ḥadith that were different in style and format. Ḥadith collections that were authored during the late second century by Imām Mālik, Ibn Jurayj and Sufyān al-Thawrī, for example, brought the various themes of ḥadith within a single volume instead of the separate volumes that were devoted to individual themes. But these works still continued al-Zuhri’s method of joining the sayings and fatwā of the Companions and Followers with the ḥadith of the Prophet on particular subjects. This can be seen, for example, in the Muwatṭa‘ of Imām Mālik, and the Musnad of Imām Shāfi‘i, the only two works that have reached us of that period. There are also references in earlier writings to a work entitled al-Āthār by Muḥammad b. Ḥasan al-Shaybānī and similar other contributions which have not survived but it seems likely that much of their contents have been covered by subsequent works that were written some years later.

The Muwatṭa‘ of Imām Mālik is often described as the leading work among the famous ḥadith collections, even preceding, in some ways, that of al-Bukhārī. The Imām wrote his Muwatṭa‘ in response to a request by the ‘Abbāsid Caliph al-Manṣūr who solicited a work of authority on the aḥkām of Shari‘a that were founded in authentic Sunna. The Imām revised and consolidated his work many times and it is said to have taken him forty years to complete. The classification of its contents are organised in an order that is typical of the works of fiqh, which is why it is sometimes identified as a work both of fiqh and ḥadith.
The third-century hijra marked, yet again, a new phase of development in the documentation of hadith. One of the distinctive features of the writings of this period was to isolate the Sunna of the Prophet from the sayings of the Companions and fatwas of the learned figures among the Followers. The earliest works of this period were the Musnad of Abū Dāwūd al-Ṭayālīsī (d. 204 H) and then the much larger work of that genre, the Musnad of Imām Āḥmad b. Ḥanbal (d.
241 H). Ḥadith writers during the third century on the whole observed the principles of usūl al-ḥadīth that had already gained recognition and the methodological guidelines that were developed were consequently put into effect. By the beginning of the fourth century, writers drew a clear distinction between a sound or šahīh hadith and a defective or muʾallal ḥadīth. Then came the period of the mutaʾakhkhirūn or latecomers of the ḥadīth writers, which marked the beginning of reproductive writings, glosses and commentaries on existing works that were authored by the pioneers, or mutaqaddimūn, of the ḥadīth literature.²⁴
THE different stages of development in the compilation of ḥadīth and their classification may be summarised under ten headings as follows. It may be said at the outset, however, that these categories are not exclusive in that they tend to overlap and are, in any case, meant to be used as aids to a better understanding of the vast literature of ḥadīth. The ḥadīth literature has thus been classified as follows.

1. The Ṣaḥīḥa (lit. booklet) collections which marked, as already discussed, the earliest stage in the documentation of ḥadīth. At this stage, aḥādīth were simply put together in writing, often for purposes of personal use, without any order or classification. This period actually started during the lifetime of the Prophet and continued until the early second century and it is generally known as the Ṣaḥīḥa period.

2. The Muṣannaf collections manifested the second stage in the development of ḥadīth literature. Unlike the ṣaḥīḥa collections which were not classified, the muṣannaf (lit. classified) consisted of thematic classification of ḥadīth. Starting at about the middle of the second century, during this stage, ḥadīth belonging to particular themes were classified under separate titles and chapters. Famous in the muṣannaf category are the Muwatta’ of Imām Mālik (d. 179), the Muṣannaf of Ma’mar b. Rāshid (d. 154) and the Muṣannaf of ʿAbd al-Razzāq b. Humām al-Ṣanʿānī (d. 211).
3. The Musnad (lit. supported) compilations marked the next stage in the documentation of hadith, and it signified a stage wherein greater attention was paid to the chain of transmission or * isnād* which linked the hadith to the Prophet through the reports of reliable narrators that usually started with a Companion. All hadith that were narrated by one Companion, regardless of the subject matter, were put under his or her name. The main purpose of the musnad writing was obviously to compile the largest possible number of hadith for the sake of preservation and record. All ahādīth that were transmitted by particular individuals on any subject were put together without much attention to classification on the basis of subject matter. This stage is considered as the richest of all. It began during the latter half of the second century and famous in this category was the Musnad of Imām Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal (164-241) which contains 40,000 ahādīth including 10,000 repetitions reported by about 700 Companions. It was derived from a much larger mass of 750,000 ahādīth, and it took the Imām some twenty years to complete. Even then, the work was unconsolidated and in separate parts, until the Imām’s son, ‘Abd Allāh, consolidated the work to which he also added some of his own findings. Other works in this category are the Musnad of Ibn al-Najjār (d. 262), the Musnad of Abū Dāwūd Sulaymān b. Dāwūd al-Ṭayālī (d. 204 H) and many others.

The musnad compilers differed in their arrangement of names of Companions. Some of them begin with the four Pious Caliphs followed by the remaining six of the ten who had the tiding of Paradise from the Prophet (i.e. ʿal-ushara al-mubahshara). These are followed by the Companions who embraced Islam first, then by those who migrated with the Prophet, those who participated in the Battle of Badr, and then in the treaty of Ḥudaybiyya, those who embraced Islam on the occasion of the conquest of Makka, then women among the Companions until it reaches the generation of the Followers, or tābiʿūn. Some of the books are arranged alphabetically and some according to regions and tribes. The musnads are not easy to use since their contents are not classified subject-wise.

4. The Ṣaḥīḥ (sound/authentic) collections represented the fourth and basically the last stage in the development of hadith literature. This is manifested in the third-century compilations through the works mainly of al-Bukhārī and Muslim, referred to as sahihayn, or the two authentic collections. The term sahihayn is, however, not used in the exclusive sense as there are sahih ahadith in all the other major collections of hadith. Nor did al-Bukhārī include in his work all the qualified narrators of hadith, for he only planned to compile a short book (mukhtasar) on hadith which was not all-inclusive of either the narrators or the hadith. Since al-Bukhārī did not intend his collection to be all-inclusive, it would follow that no one may call a hadith unreliable or weak simply because it has not appeared in al-Bukhārī. This is also true of Sahih Muslim.\footnote{\textsuperscript{3}}

Muhammad b. Ismā‘il al-Bukhārī (194–256 H) travelled widely and devoted sixteen years to the compilation of Sahih al-Bukhārī which has remained to this day the most authoritative of all collections. Al-Bukhārī interviewed over 1,000 hadith transmitters, or shaykhs, in the Hijāz, Egypt, Nishapur, Merw and Iraq and allegedly collected a vast number of about 600,000 ahadith from which he then selected 9,082 ahadith. He has repeated ahadith which had more than one chain of isnād as the strength and reliability of the isnād is deemed to increase with the plurality of its chains of transmission. When such repetitions are taken into account, the original figure of 600,000 is also likely to be drastically reduced. For a single hadith is sometimes transmitted through ten different chains of transmission all of which would in the end establish just one hadith. Al-Bukhārī went on record to say that he offered two units of prayer each time he selected a hadith to include in his Sahih al-Bukhārī. It seems that al-Bukhārī wrote a good portion of his book during his residence in Makka and Madīna and the rest in Baṣra, Kūfa, and Bukhārā. Another report has it that he completed the first draft of his work in the Holy Mosque in Makka and the rest in Bukhārā. When al-Bukhārī completed his work, he showed it to some of the leading ‘ulamā’ of his time, the Imām Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, Yahyā b. Ma‘īn and ‘Ali b. al-Madini, among others, who were among the important sources, or shaykhs, of al-Bukhārī, and they were pleased with it and verified it except for four ahadith, but it is said that al-Bukhārī kept those and verified them to be reliable.\footnote{\textsuperscript{4}} ‘Ali b. al-Madini was the most learned man of his time especially en defects (‘ilal) of hadith and he expressed full confidence in al-Bukhārī.
Al-Bukhārī was meticulous in the verification of ḥadīth and yet tactful and gentle in regard to those whom he impugned as unreliable. Some of his expressions such as sakātū ʿanhu (many remained silent concerning him) or fihi nazar (one has to look into him) or tarākāhu (abandoned) and similar other epithetic descriptions of al-Bukhārī are noted in this regard as being generally clear of backbiting or defaming others. He was affluent and had inherited wealth which he generously spent on students and other charitable causes.

Discounting all repetitions, Al-Bukhārī contains 2,602 ahādīth. It is divided into 106 books and a total of 3,450 chapters. Each chapter bears a heading which is descriptive of its contents. It seems that al-Bukhārī usually took a portion of the ḥadīth for the heading of the chapter. Some of these headings are reflective of al-Bukhārī’s personal insight and knowledge of ḥadīth that is not found in other collections. Yet it has also meant rather too many headings and chapters which are, however, too numerous and tend to make the work somewhat difficult to use.

Works that preceded that of al-Bukhārī tended to mix the sayings of Companions and Followers with the ḥadīth proper as they did not draw a clear distinction between them. Al-Bukhārī committed himself to include only the Sound ḥadīth in his collection and classified them subject-wise. Al-Bukhārī included ḥadīth with an unbroken isnād narrated by upright and retentive individuals (al-ʿudūl al-dāḥītīn) which were also free of defect (ʿilla) and oddities (shudhūdāh), and the narrators had met with one another. He continued the work of Shihāb al-Zuhri (d. 124) and in many ways took al-Zuhri as a point of reference in his methodology and selection. Al-Bukhārī paid greater attention to narrators from al-Zuhri’s generation who were disciples of al-Zuhri, travelled with him, or remained in his company, as compared to those who did not benefit from al-Zuhri’s teaching and influence. Al-Bukhārī’s (and Muslim’s) chain of isnād has been characterised as to rely in the first place on the narration of ḥadīth from the Prophet by a verified Companion whose identity as a Companion is free of doubt. This is narrated in turn by two upright Followers, or by one Follower who is verified by at least two narrators for having transmitted ḥadīth from the Companions. The third link in al-Bukhārī’s chain of isnād consists of an upright and retentive Successor (tābi’tābi’t)” from whom other narrators (in the fourth generation) have also reported. The fifth link in al-Bukhari's isnād is likely to be al-Bukhari's own shaykh/teacher who is an upright and retentive narrator. He did not record hadith from narrators whose trustworthiness he doubted. It was important for al-Bukhari to ensure that at least two people had narrated hadith from the preceding links, be it a Companion, Follower, Successor and so on. This is a general characterisation as exceptions are found, for example, in the case of a Companion, Mirdas al-Aslamī, whose hadith al-Bukhari has recorded but only one person (Qays b. Häzim) has reported hadith from him.⁷

Al-Bukhari himself entitled his work as Jāmiʾ Ṣaḥīh al-Musnad al-Mukhīsār min Ḥadīth Rasūl Allah wa-Sunanihi wa-Ayyāmih. This is indicative of al-Bukhari's methodology and approach. The word 'al-Jāmi' (lit. comprehensive) signifies that the coverage of al-Bukhari extends to all the eight areas that al-Jāmi'c are generally known to cover. These are the ṭaqā'id (dogmatics), ahkām (legal rules), al-riqāq (moral teachings), ādāb al-ta'ām wa'l-sharāb (etiquette of eating and drinking), al-tafsīr wa'l-tārikh wa'l-siyar (Qurʾān commentary, history and biography of the Prophet), al-saṣjar wa'l-qiyyām wa'l-qu'ūd (travel and movement), al-fītans (tumults), and al-manāqib (the virtues of the Prophet and his Companions). Sunan al-Tirmidhi is also a Jāmi' collection as it comprises hadith on all of these various themes. "Al-Ṣaḥīh" in al-Bukhari's title signified that he has not included in his collection a weak (da'if) hadith that he might have known as such. Whereas the term musnad implied that the aḥādīth he compiled were all connected with a sound chain of isnād up to the level of the Companion reporting from the Prophet. Al-Bukhari was thus the first to compile a comprehensive (jāmi') collection of this kind on hadith. The only work that preceded him was the Muwatta' of Imām Mālik, which was, however, not a jāmi' as it was basically confined to the ahkām or legal hadith only. Al-Bukhari isolated the sayings of Companions and tābi'ūn from the Prophetic hadith, and this is also a distinctive feature of his work when compared, for example, to the Muwatta' of Imām Mālik.⁸

Al-Bukhari has explained how he was inspired to undertake the writing of his Ṣaḥīh al-Bukhari when he noted that he was in the company of his teacher, Ishāq b. Rāhawayh, together with some of his other disciples when he mentioned in passing "if you were to compile a compendium (kitāban mukhtāsaran) of the authentic Sunna (li-Ṣaḥīḥ al-Sunna) of the Messenger of God, peace be on him.” Al-Bukhārī says that the idea occurred to him then and his inspiration became stronger when he dreamt one night that he stood in front of the Prophet and al-Bukhārī had a fan in his hand. This he understood to mean that he was blessed with the task of removing doubts and impurity from the Sunna of the Prophet.

Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim

Muslim b. al-Hajjāj al-Nisābūrī (206–261 H) compiled his Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim, which contains 10,000 ahādīth (3,030 without repetitions), derived from a much larger mass of about 300,000 ahādīth. Muslim was in many ways a follower of al-Bukhārī, which he has acknowledged himself and has to a large extent also utilised al-Bukhārī’s methods. When al-Bukhārī came to Nishapur, then one of the finest cities of Khurāsān, Muslim kept him company and he held al-Bukhārī in affection and esteem. Muslim also learned from al-Bukhārī’s teacher, ʿIshaq b. Rāhawayh, who was one of the leading scholars of Khurāsān. This may partly explain why Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim generally ranks second next to Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī, except for the ‘ulamā’ of North Africa and the Maghreb who tend to rank Muslim first. This reverse order of ranking refers basically to the superior classification of Muslim which is based on subject matter and compiles all ahādīth on the same subject, together with their various chains of isnād under one heading or chapter. Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim is consequently better consolidated and easier to use compared to Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī.

Those who knew Muslim spoke highly of his retentive memory, his piety, and dedication to scholarship. He went to ḥajj at the age of twenty and he learned from some of the leading figures in Makka. He also went to Baghdad on several occasions. Many of the leading figures of his time, including Abū Ḥātim al-Rāzī, Abū ʿIsā al-Tirmidhī, Abū Bakr b. Khuzayma, among others, have narrated hadīth from Muslim, and held him in affection and esteem.

One of the reasons that prompted Muslim to write his work, Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim, was that works of hadīth that were available then were somewhat difficult to use, and he addressed himself to the task of writing a reliable work that is easy to utilise. Although al-Bukhāri’s work was classified subject wise, it left room for improvement, which Muslim had obviously targeted for his own work. He completed his work in fifteen years and showed it to Abū Zur‘a al-Rāzī and implemented his suggestions concerning hadith that were defective (ma‘īnî) and included, as a result, only hadith that were clear of ‘illa. Muslim went on record to say that his work consisted of Sound/Sahih hadith but noted “I did not say that what I have verified in this book is devoid of weak reports.” The other purpose that motivated Imám Muslim was the same as motivated al-Bukhāri, which was to purify the Sunna of the Prophet from the accretions of story-tellers, the Zanâdiqa (heretics) and those who were moved by ignorance and prejudice. He also tried to confine his selection of hadith to a manageable size as he considered it to be easier to ensure the accuracy of a smaller bulk compared to a much larger one.12

Muslim’s classification resembles that of al-Bukhāri in regard to its main headings but Muslim’s division of chapters is better consolidated and self-contained. It has fewer repetitions and does not summarise hadith in the way al-Bukhāri has done. He is known for his careful use of the terms hadath anā and ukhbaranā, in that he reserves the former for direct hearing by the disciple from the shaykh whereas the latter is used when the disciple has read back to the shaykh for his approval and verification. This is generally adopted but there are many among hadith scholars who have used these two terms interchangeably.13

Al-Bukhāri tends to be more stringent in qualifying hadith as Sahih/authentic. Al-Bukhāri’s conditions of admitting a hadith as a Sahih hadith signified not only that the immediate links in the chain of isnād were contemporaries of one another, but also that they had actually met and direct hearing took place between the teacher and disciple. For Muslim it was sufficient if the two were contemporaries even if they had not actually met one another. Muslim was content, in other words, with the possibility of personal encounter whereas al-Bukhāri required proof of an actual encounter between the transmitter and recipient of hadith.14

A comparative evaluation of the transmitters of al-Bukhāri and Muslim also reveals that more of al-Bukhāri’s transmitters qualify for the requirements of just character (‘adala) and retentiveness (al-dhâh)
than that of Muslim’s, and there are consequently fewer transmitters in al-Bukhārī that are considered weak (da’īf) than there are in Muslim.

Thus it is noted that of the total of 439 or so of al-Bukhārī’s transmitters, only about 80 have been questioned or labelled as weak, whereas of the total of 620 narrators of Muslim, the critics have raised questions over 160. About 89 of al-Bukhārī’s hadith have been identified to have some defect, whereas in Muslim’s collection, such hadith have been numbered at 100.15

Al-Bukhārī and Muslim have not claimed to contain an exhaustive collection of the hadith and some ahādīth which are not recorded in their collections have been compiled in the four collections namely of Sunan Abū Dāwūd, Sunan al-Nasā’ī, Sunan al-Tirmidhī, and Sunan Ibn Māja.

5. The Sunan Collections: Works that fall under this classification specialise in the legal hadith, or ahādīth al-ahkām. The various chapters of Sunan are thus devoted to practical rules (ahkām ʿamaliyya) that pertain, for example, to cleanliness, ritual prayer, the legal alms, the pilgrimage, marriage and divorce and so forth. Sunan Abū Dāwūd of Sulaymān b. Ashʿath al-Sijistānī (d. 275), which consists of 4,800 legal ahādīth, stands out for its comprehensive treatment of legal ahādīth. Abū Dāwūd did not confine his Sunan to the collection of sound/ṣaḥīḥ hadith alone but included with it Fair/Ḥasan in both its varieties, that is Ḥasan in its own right (i.e. li-dhātih), and Ḥasan due to an extraneous factor (i.e. li-ghayrīh). He wrote that whenever he included weak hadith he identified it as such and explained it by identifying the point of weakness in its isnād. This would imply that when he does not specify weakness in a hadith that he has recorded, it is deemed to be acceptable and sound. In the chapter on cleanliness (al-ṭahārah), for example, Abū Dāwūd records a hadith from Naṣr b. ʿAlī, from Abī ʿAlī al-Ḥanāfī, from Hammām, from Ibn Jurayj, from al-Zuhārī, from Anas that “whenever the Prophet, peace be on him, intended to pass a motion, he would remove his ring (on which God’s name was inscribed)”. Abū Dāwūd then says that this hadith is munkar (confused), as it is probably mixed up with another hadith also narrated by Ibn Jurayj, from Ibn ʿAbd from al-Zuhārī from Anas that “the Prophet, peace be on him, made a ring from silver, then he threw it off”. The weak point in the former hadith is Hammām; no one else except Hammām has reported this hadith. In connection with another hadith, after giving two various versions of it, Muslim wrote “The one related by Anas is more accurate than the other.”

Many have considered Sunan Abū Dāwūd to be so comprehensive on legal hadith and on halāl and harām that “it is sufficient for the mujtahid” to obtain the knowledge of halāl and harām from Abū Dāwūd. The author’s effort to identify points of weakness in hadith that he recorded is yet another distinctive feature of Abū Dāwūd’s collection. Al-Suyūṭī wrote that when Abū Dāwūd remains silent concerning a weak hadith, it is likely to belong to the Hasan category. Being confined to legal ahādith, Abū Dāwūd’s Sunan does not expatiate in historical narrative, stories, moral themes on pious and virtuous deeds (al-zuhd wa fudā’il al-‘amīl) and so forth. He is said to have extracted his collection of 5,274 ahādith (4,800 without repetitions) from a much larger mass of 500,000 ahādith. He went on record to say that he did not include in his Sunan hadith from those that were identified as matrūk al-ḥadīth (abandoned for their careless reporting of hadith), which is probably why it has been ranked next in order of reliability to the sahih. This may also be due to his erudition and scholarship as well as piety and dedication to worship. In this regard, many have compared Abū Dāwūd to Imām Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal. Abū Dāwūd resided during the last three years of his life (272-275) in Baṣra at the invitation of the Governor of Baṣra who was a brother of the ‘Abbāsid Caliph, al-Muwaffaq. Students came to his circle of teaching from all directions. Abū Dāwūd also travelled widely in the Hijāz, Egypt, Iraq, al-Šām, North Africa and Khurāsān. He died in Baṣra and was buried next to Sufyān al-Thawrī.19

One of the distinctive features of Abū Dāwūd’s work is that he gives the various sources through which he received the ḥadīth and also the various versions of the hadith he might have received. He frequently pointed out the weakness or strength of the various versions he recorded and also declared which version he considered to be more reliable.

Another work to be mentioned in the Sunan category is that of Muḥammad b. Yazīd al-Qazwīnī (d. 273 H), better known as Ibn Māja, bearing the title, Sunan Ibn Majā, which contains 4,341 ahādīth, of which 3,002 ahādīth have been recorded by the authors of the previous works, there remaining 1,329 ahādīth which are recorded by Ibn Majā alone.

Ibn Majā travelled to the Hijāz, Iraq, Egypt and Syria and met with many of the leading scholars and transmitters of ḥadīth. He was the leading ḥadīth scholar of Qazwīn and was also equally well-known as a leading Qur’ān commentator (mufassir) of his time. His Sunan collection includes, in addition to Sound/Ṣaḥīḥ ḥadīth, also ḥadīth in the other two categories of Fair and Weak (Hasan, Ḍa‘īf) which is why his Sunan was not included among the six leading collections until the early sixth-century hijra when Abū ʿĪsā Faḍl Muhammad b. Ṭāhir al-Maqdīsī (d. 507) included it as one of the reliable works on ḥadīth, and then other scholars also recognised it as one of the main collections. Up until that time, ḥadīth scholars tended to regard the Mumawwta of Imām Mālik (d. 179 H) as the sixth major work on ḥadīth in preference to the Sunan of Ibn Majā.

The reason that prompted the ḥadīth scholars into giving priority to Sunan Ibn Majā over the Mumawwta was mainly due to the fact that the former contained additional ḥadīth, and additional insād on existing ahādīth, to what was already documented in the first five collections, whereas the Mumawwta contained very little in addition to what was already known, although the Mumawwta still commanded higher ranking in terms of reliability and ṣīḥa. A leading 20th-century ḥadīth scholar, Muhammad Fuḍād ʿAbd al-Bāqī, has concluded that Sunan Ibn Majā contains 1,339 additional ahādīth most of which have been recorded by the other five collections, but Ibn Majā has recorded them through different chains of transmitters. Ibn Majā went on record to say that he showed his work to the leading ḥadīth scholar of his time, Abū Zurʿa al-Raḍī, who was impressed with it and considered it in some ways superior to the existing works on ḥadīth but added that it may contain ḥadīth that were weak in insād. Ibn Ḥajar al-ʿAsqalānī has also spoken about Sunan Ibn Majā along similar lines and confirmed the existence of weak ḥadīth therein. Many commentators have noted, however, that the ḥadīth Ibn Majā has recorded on the virtues of his home town, Qazwīn, are fabricated. Among them was Ibn al-Jawzī who declared in his work Mawdūʿat that nearly all the ḥadīth on the merit of individuals, tribes or towns were fabricated and many of them were found in Sunan Ibn Māja.

Sunan al-Nasāʾi by al-Hāfiẓ Abū ʿAbd al-Rahmān Ahmad b.
Shuʿayb al-Nasāʾi (d. 303) is another work in the Sunan category which consists of 5,000 legal aḥādīth of which a great number had appeared in the previous collections. Nasāʾi compiled his Sunan in two stages. The initial work which he completed contained ḥadīth in all the three categories of sound, fair and weak but did not record ḥadīth from narrators that were generally abandoned (mattrāk) by the ḥadīth critics. This work bore the title Al-Sunan al-Kubrā which the author presented to the ʿAbbāsid ruler of Ramla in Palestine. The latter then questioned al-Nasāʾi as to whether all of his collection consisted of Sound/Ṣaḥīḥ ḥadīth. To this the author responded that it consisted of Ṣaḥīḥ and Hasan ḥadiths and what came close to them and resembled them. He was then requested to compile a work that contained only Ṣaḥīḥ ḥadīth, and it was then that he revised his Al-Sunan al-Kubrā and extracted therefrom a smaller collection (al-sunan al-sughrā) which the author then entitled Al-Mujtabā min al-Sunan (the selected portion of Sunan) often summarised as Al-Mujtabā. This is the collection that is currently in use and it contains very little weak hadith. It is considered as one of the most reliable works after the Ṣaḥiḥayn which is also one of the best in terms of classification of its subject matter.
Sunan al-Nasāʾi is ranked equal to that of Sunan Abū Dāmūd as the author is known to have been scrupulous in isolating doubtful ḥadīth from his collection and also his classification is of a fiqhī style. Sunan Abū Dāmūd is still considered the first book in Sunan category as it tends to provide additional data on the textual subject matter (maṭn) of ḥadīth that is of interest to the fiqhāʾ.

6. The ḽamiʿ collections: This genre of ḥadīth literature signifies a comprehensive approach to ḥadīth collection due mainly to the broad range of topics that it includes. As already noted, the ḽamiʿ collections are expected to include a chapter each on dogmatics (aqīd), legal rules (ahkām), moral teachings (al-riqāq), social etiquette (al-ādāb), exegesis of the Qurʾān and the Sunna, history and biography of the Prophet (al-taḥṣīr waʾl-tāriḵh wa al-siyār), virtues of the Prophet and his Companions (al-manāqib) and crises (al-fīṭāḥ). The collections of al-Bukhārī, Muslim and that of al-Tirmidhī fall under the ḫāṭri category as they comprise ḥadith on all of these eight subjects. Al-Tirmidhī’s collection is occasionally identified as a Sunan work, which is due to his juristic style of classification of chapters in line with the fiqh works. Al-Ḥākim al-Nisābūrī (d. 405) referred to Tirmidhī’s collection as “al-Ḥāṭir Ṣaḥḥah” which later scholars have considered somewhat of an exaggeration due to the fact that it contains ḥadith in all the three categories of Ṣaḥḥah (sound), Ḥasan (fair) and Daʿīf (weak). The work is generally known as Ḥāṭir al-Tirmidhī, which is accurate as already explained. He included not only Sound or Ṣaḥḥah ḥadith in his work but also ḥadith which were accepted and practised by the jurists. This is a feature of his work in that he collected ḥadith that were practised and accepted by the jurists and the community at large, except as it is noted, for two ahādīth neither of which are followed in practice. The first of these provides that “the Prophet, peace be on him, combined the zuhr and ‘asr prayers and those of the maghrib and ʿishā’ without fear or travelling” (normally combination (ja’m)) is valid in those two situations). The second ḥadith has it concerning the wine drinker that “if he repeats for the fourth time, he shall be killed.”22 Another distinguishing feature of al-Tirmidhī’s collection is that he gives the isnād of the ḥadith and then also gives other alternative isnāds through which the same ḥadith is narrated. Sometimes he does not give this latter isnād in full but merely identifies a well-known narrator therein. Although al-Tirmidhī contains weak and sometimes defective (muʾallal) ḥadith, the fact that he records only ahādīth that are narrated or practised by prominent jurists and Imāms has meant that it is reasonably clear of spurious and fabricated ḥadith, as it would be unlikely that such ahādīth would be accepted by knowledgeable individuals of prominence.23

Shāh Waliullāh al-Dīhlawī placed Ḥāṭir al-Tirmidhī, Sunan Abū Dāwūd and Sunan al-Nasā’ī in the second rank next to the Ṣaḥḥāyān and the Muwatta’ of Imām Mālik. Then he added that al-Tirmidhī has improved the methods of the earlier works and included additional information concerning views and opinions of the leading scholars among the Companions, the Followers and other scholars. He also specified the sound from the weak ḥadīth and explained the grounds of weakness in ḥadīth.24
Until Tirmidhi’s time, hadith scholars divided hadith into the two categories of Sahih and Da’if. Da’if was also of two types, one of which was the abandoned (matrūk) variety, and the other which was not abandoned; the latter was rarely called Hasan by the previous scholars of hadith and it was al-Tirmidhi that used the term Hasan consistently and this was then added as an intermediate class to the binary classification of hadith that had hitherto prevailed. Al-Tirmidhi also used Hasan in other combinations such as Hasan Sahih and Hasan Gharib, terms which were coined by al-Tirmidhi himself. These will be explained in our discussion of Sahih, Hasan and Da’if below.

It thus appears that each of the six leading collections of hadith has characteristic features of their own. Al-Bukhari stands out in regard to the in-depth knowledge and insight that it conveys concerning hadith (al-tafaqquh fi’l-hadith), whereas Muslim is better consolidated and applies a superior thematic arrangement to that of al-Bukhari. Al-Tirmidhi offers much information on usul al-hadith and methodology of hadith transmission, whereas Abu Dawud is comprehensive on legal hadith or akhādīth al-aqkām. Ibn Majah is elegant and more refined in terms of classification of themes and chapters of hadith, whereas al-Nasawi is said to have combined most of these qualities.

7. Al-Mu’jam (pl. ma’ajim) collections refers to books of hadith in which the contents appear in alphabetical order under the names of the narrators and their teachers, or the cities and tribes to which the narrators might have belonged. An example of this is Al-Mu’jam al-Kabir by Abū’l-Qāsim Sulaymān b. Aḥmad b. Ayyūb al-Taḥārānī (d. 360 H) in which he compiled hadith narrated by Companions under their names. The names are arranged in alphabetical order and it contains 25,000 aḥādīth. This author has also compiled two other Mu’jam works, known as Al-Mu’jam al-Awsat and Al-Mu’jam al-Ṣaghīr. Jalāl al-Dīn al-Suyūṭī (d. 911) authored a mu’jam entitled Ḥādh al-Layl wa-jāri‘ al-Sayl concerning his own teachers and shaykhs, that numbered 150 persons, and also a smaller Mu’jam entitled Zād al-Maṣīr fi’l-Fihrist al-Ṣaghīr in which he listed fifty narrators of hadith in alphabetical order.

8. Al-Mustadrak (pl. mustadrakāt), Mustadrak which literally means ‘discovered’ or ‘detected’ refers to hadith books and collections in which the compiler has supplemented the work of a previous compiler or compilers. Having accepted the conditions laid down by previous compilers, the new compilers collect other ahādīth which fulfil those conditions but have been left out of the previous works. The Mustadrak ‘ala’l-Šāhīhāyān of al-Ḥākim al-Nisābūrī (d. 405) thus consists of ḥadīth additions to al-Bukhārī and Muslim which escaped those authors’ attention but which conformed to their conditions. A critic has stated, however, that the conformity of some of these additions to the conditions of al-Bukhārī and Muslim is not free of doubt. Thus on occasions, al-Ḥākim identified a ḥadīth as Ṣaḥīh on questionable grounds, or that he brought out ḥadīth which al-Bukhārī and Muslim themselves have not validated due to some weakness therein.\(^\text{57}\)

9. Al-Mustakhraj (pl. mustakhrajāt). The mustakhraj (lit. extracted) are collections of ḥadīth in which a later compiler collects fresh isnāds for the same ahādīth that were compiled in the previous works. The fresh attempt usually draws attention to transmitters that did not feature in the initial isnād. The two versions may be identical after the addition of the new link or links or may consist of two different chains of isnād altogether. The Mustakhraj of Abū Bakr b. Ibrāhīm al-İsmā’īlī (d. 371) on Ṣaḥīh al-Bukhārī and that of Ya’qūb b. Ishaq b. Ibrāhīm al-İsfarā’īnī (d. 316) on Ṣaḥīh Muslim, and also the Mustakhraj ‘ala’l-Ṣaḥīhāyān by Abū ‘Abd Allāh Muḥammad b. Ya’qūb b. Yūsuf b. al-Shaybānī al-Nisābūrī, known as Ibn al-Akıhram (d. 344) are examples.

10. Al-Juz’ (pl. ajzā’). Al-juz’ (lit. section) refers to a book or collection in which ḥadīth is narrated by a single narrator among the Companions and others. Ḥadīth that are narrated by Abū Bakr and put in one collection is thus called juz’ Abī Bakr. It also refers to monographic collections of ḥadīth on a single theme or subject. Thus ahādīth on night rising collected by al-Marwazi are known as juz’ fi Qiyām al-Layl li’l-Marwazi. A juz’ consists, in other words, of what may be seen as a single chapter or section of a jāmi’ collection.\(^\text{28}\)

At about the middle of the fourth century hijra, the two ṣaḥīhs of al-Bukhārī and Muslim and the two Ṣunāns of Abū Dāwūd and al-Nasā’ī were recognised as the best collections of ḥadīth. After some time, the Jāmi’ of al-Tirmidhī was added and the five books together were given the distinguished title of Al-uṣūl al-khamsa (the five source books).

It is not accurately known as to when the Jāmi‘ of al-Tirmidhi received the recognition and general approval of ḥadīth scholars. Ibn Ḥazm al-Zāhirī in the mid-fifth century criticised it for having recorded ḥadīth from al-Maslūb and al-Kalbī who were unreliable. It is likely that al-Tirmidhi’s work was recognised well before that of Ibn Māja’s collection, which was the last to be added to the five collections. Abū al-Fadl Muhammad b. Tāhir (d. 505/1111) appears to have been the first to support Ibn Māja’s addition to the five collections and this was later endorsed by other ḥadīth scholars. By the seventh century hijra, the six books had been generally recognised by the world of Islam as the reliable collections of ḥadīth. Equally well recognised was the fact that among the six works, the first two, namely al-Bukhārī and Muslim, occupied the first rank.29

The main criteria that guided the ḥadīth scholars in their selection of the six works may be summarised as follows:

a. The compilers of these works employed certain principles of criticism and selection in their collections.

b. The six collections consisted mainly of Sound and Fair ḥadīth and if they added weak ahādīth, they identified them as such, or that they were negligible in number.

c. The compilers had examined the value, merit and demerit of the ḥadīth they collected, discussed the reliability of their narrators, and explained the rare ḥadīth, if any, in their collections.

d. Subsequent experts of ḥadīth examined these works and considered them to be reliable.

The musnad, muṣannaf and other collections that were compiled before or after the ṣahīhs of al-Bukhārī and Muslim contained both reliable and weak ḥadīths, which had not, however, been thoroughly examined by the ḥadīth scholars nor were they widely used by the jurists, and they were generally overshadowed by the six main collections.30
Biographies of Ḥadīth Transmitters

ʿIlm Tārīkh al-Ruwāt

THIS branch of ḥadīth studies is sometimes referred to as ʿilm al-rijāl al-ḥadīth, and also ʿabqāʿ al-ruwāt (classes of narrators), and asmāʿ al-rijāl (names of authorities). It is concerned mainly with biographical data, chronology, and life histories of ḥadīth transmitters, their academic achievements, their teachers, their students, school of following, political leaning and views of other people concerning them. All information that has a bearing on reliability or otherwise of their narration of ḥadīth, indeed any information that helps to explain and identify the personality and character of the ḥadīth transmitter is of concern to this branch of ʿulūm al-ḥadīth. Biographical data on ḥadīth transmitters is also concerned with precise identification of the generation (tabaqa) and time frame in which ḥadīth transmitters lived.

Ḥadīth transmitters have occasionally acted against the normal order of ḥadīth transmission. Sometimes a Companion narrates ḥadīth from a Follower (tābiʿi), or a father from son, in which case it is important that one is able to identify instances of this kind in the isnād. The normal order that is expected of isnād is that a person in the lower generation or tabaqa narrates ḥadīth from the preceding generation. It is also expected that the transmission occurs on a vertical line in an order where each generation is represented by one narrator. But this normal order frequently changes in parts of the isnād where, for example, two or three Companions, or two or three Followers, or Successors narrate from one another before the isnād shifts to a lower level. Sometimes relatives and family members narrate from one another horizontally in one generation. These and similar other factors have prompted the ḥadith scholars to identify the classes/generations (tablā) of ḥadith narrators.

The Companions are basically one tabqa, yet they have been classified in more than a dozen classes based on their seniority and closeness to the Prophet, their precedence in embracing Islam, time of migration to Madīna and participation in the various battles, beginning, for example, with the battles of Badr, Uḥud and so forth. Two persons may sometimes belong to the same tabqa from a certain perspective, but fall under different tabqa from a different perspective. The Companion, Anas b. Mālik al-Anṣārī, for example, is one of the junior Companions (min asāghir al-sāḥibā), but he joins the leading Companions for being one of “ashara mubashshara.

Other factors that are brought to light by the biographers are exact identification of names especially when a person may be known by various names. The identification also of who is a Companion or tābi‘ī, or tābi‘ tābi‘ī and so on, are not self evident concerning the narrators of ḥadith and it is the concern of this branch of ḥadith to provide them as accurately as possible. Then the tābi‘īn are also subdivided on the basis, for example, of the fact of their encounter with one of the “ashara mubashshara, that is, the ten Companions to whom the Prophet gave the tiding of entry to Paradise. This is followed by the leading tābi‘īn that include the seven leading jurists of Madīna (al-fuqahā‘ al-sab‘a) and so on.¹

It is possible, as experience shows, that a person is most pious and trustworthy yet weak in respect of retention and memory. Ḥadith transmitted by such persons may not be admitted on the merit only of their piety. It is also possible, as ḥadith scholars have noted, that a person is sound and reliable at one time and his condition changes due to personal situations, adoption of controversial views, illness and the like which may cast doubt on his reliability, and his transmission, therefore, of ḥadith.² The ‘ulamā‘ of ḥadīth are normally careful not to accept narration of ḥadīth from unknown people and persons of obscure identity and character. It is therefore not enough if a ḥadīth narrator is not known for transgression and doubtful statements but also that his propriety and trustworthiness is supported by positive evidence together with all relevant factors relating to their knowledge, piety, truthfulness, soundness of memory and association with others. This is in conformity with the widely-quoted statement of an early hadith scholar, ʿAbd Allāh b. al-Mubārak (d. 181/797) who said that “isnād is a part of the religion, for without the verification of isnād, people may say what they wish to say.” Isnād is concerned with accurate recording of the facts of hadith and chronology (al-tārīkh) and plays a particularly important role in it. Investigation of the relevant dates has often revealed that spurious and careless statements have been made by individuals concerning the isnād. An early scholar of hadith and a leading figure of al-Shām (Syria), Ismāʿīl b. ʿAyyāsh (d. 182/898) is quoted to have asked a man concerning a hadith he had narrated from a Follower (tābiʿi), Khalīd b. Maʿdān “When did you write the hadith from Khalīd b. Maʿdān?” and the answer given was “the year 113 hijra.” This invoked the comment from Ibn ʿAyyāsh “Do you suppose that you heard the hadith from him seven years after his death? – for Ibn Maʿdān died in 106 H.” Hafs b. Ghiyāth, a judge and hadith scholar of Kūfa (d. 194/810) has been quoted to the effect “when you suspect a transmitter of hadith, then judge him by the years,” that is, his age, and the age of his immediate source, and time of encounter with his shaykh over the hadith in question. Sufyān al-Thawri (d. 161/778) who is known as amīr al-muʾminin fiʾl-ḥadīth (prince of the believers in hadith) also went on record to say that “where the transmitters resorted to lying, we resorted to chronology (to judge them by it).”

This sphere of hadith studies is thus concerned primarily with biographical information which often begins with the date and place of birth and death, although it is the date of death which is the focus of attention rather than the date of birth. The information that is so documented is vast and it begins with the generation of the Companions, the Followers, and so on, while giving prominence to the leading scholars of hadith and their contributions. The earliest works on the Tārīkh al-Ruwāt is that of Ibn Saʿd al-Zuhri’s (d. 230/845) Kitāb al-Tabaqāt al-Kabīr in fifteen volumes, and that of Imām Muhammad b. Ismāʿīl al-Bukhārī (d. 256/871) Al-Tarīkh al-Kabīr, and Abū Ḥātim Muḥammad Ibn Ḥibbān al-Buṣṭī’s (d. 354/965) Mashāḥīr Ulamāʾ al-ʿArab, and many others. Ibn Ḥajar al-ʿAsqalānī’s (d. 852 H) al-Isāba fi Tamyīz al-Ṣāḥib is very well-known, and a more recent work of acclaim on the subject is Al-Risāla al-Mustajriba by Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar al-Kattānī (d. 1345/1927). Al-ʿAsqalānī’s Al-
Iṣāba was subsequently summarised by his disciple al-Suyūṭī (d. 911)
(d. 630) is another well-known work on ‘Īlm Rijāl al-Ḥadīth.

The Ṭabaqāt of Ibn Saʿd contains biographies of most of the important narrators of hadith. It is a rich mine of valuable information, not only on hadith but also on the early history of Islam. It contains biographies of more than 4,000 traditionists. Ibn Saʿd was born in Baṣra in 169 H; he travelled in Kūfa, Makka and Madīna before he settled in Baghdad. Here he came in close contact with Muḥammad b. ʿUmar al-Wāqidi, one of the early Arab historians and prolific writers of his time. Ibn Saʿd worked as al-Wāqidi’s literary secretary for many years, which gave him his title, Kāṭib al-Wāqidi, by which he is generally known. Ibn Saʿd was a man of great accomplishment in learning who attracted many distinguished students to his teachings. One of the most prominent among them was al-Balāḍhuri, the author of Futūḥ al-Buldān, who has relied extensively on Ibn Saʿd. Ibn Saʿd’s own reliance on al-Wāqidi’s works has, however, been criticised as the latter has been said to have been less than accurate in reference to hadith.

Ibn Saʿd is known to have written two other works entitled Al-Ṭabaqāt al-Ṣaghīr and Kitāb Akhbār al-Nābi respectively. They are in effect not separate works as almost all the information they contain has been included in the first two volumes of his Kitāb al-Ṭabaqāt al-Kabīr.

Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ commented on Ibn Saʿd’s Ṭabaqāt, saying that it is “an extensive work of great benefits, and its author is also reliable (thiqa), except that he has frequently recorded information from weak narrators (al-duʿāfā’), one among whom is (his teacher) Muḥammad
b. ʿUmar al-Wāqidi.”

It seems that one of Ibn Saʿd’s disciples, probably al-Ḥusayn b.
Fahm (d. 289/901) wrote portions of the Ṭabaqāt as the text in some sections contains phrases such as “haddathānā Ibn Saʿd” (Ibn Saʿd spoke to us). Ibn Fahm completed the book according to the plan of its author, added short notations to it concerning names that were already included by the author, and read the work to his own students. The first two volumes of this work are devoted to the genealogy of the Prophet Muḥammad, and his biography where the author also gives information on many of the previous prophets. The Prophet Muhammad’s early life in Makka, the beginning of his mission, migration to Madina, his various battles, illness and death, etc., are expounded in considerable detail. The rest of this voluminous work is devoted to biographical data on the Companions, which he divided into five tabaqāt, beginning with the Migrants who participated in the Battle of Badr, Companions who had migrated to Abyssinia, those who converted to Islam before the conquest of Makka, Companions who settled and lived in Kūfa, or in Basra, Baghdad and other places, and then the Followers and the Successors. Biographical notations on the Companions are long and generally contain their geneologies on both their father and mother’s side, the names of their wives and children, time of conversion to Islam, the part taken by them in the important events during the Prophet’s lifetime, the dates of their death and so forth. There is a certain degree of overlap and inclusion of the same names in different classes in his divisions, some of which is, however, considered to be inevitable. The very last volume of this work is devoted to women among the Companions and the Followers. Ibn Sa’d pays a great deal of attention to geneologies with an unusual emphasis on tribal origins and descent in a way that is reminiscent of the pre-Islamic era. In this regard Ibn Sa’d’s work stands in contrast to that of his teacher al-Waqidi. Ibn Sa’d’s biographies are generally premised on the time factor and dates such as those of migration to Abyssinia, the Hijra proper, the Battle of Badr, the conquest of Makka and so forth. Yet he also refers frequently to place names in the biographical data he has compiled. Siddiqi has quoted Prof. Sachau’s remark on Ibn Sa’d who has “shown impartiality and honesty, thoroughness and minuteness, objectivity and originality.”

Writers have taken different approaches to biographical literature on the classification of hadith transmitters. Some writers classified them in accordance with categories, or tabaqāt, that lived in the same era or generation. Famous in this category is the Tabaqāt of Ibn Sa’d. Whereas Ibn Sa’d’s work provides detailed information on biographees, the Tabaqāt al-Husaynī of al-Ḥāfiz Shams al-Dīn al-Dahabī (d. 748) contain extremely short notices on the classes and individuals of hadith transmitters. There are also some who confine their works only to the names, appellations, titles and geneologies.
Still others have classified their biographies in alphabetical order in accordance with the names of narrators and this appears to be easier to use. One of the well-known works in this category is Ibn Ḥajar al-‘Asqalānī’s Tuhdīh al-Tuhdīh in ten volumes. Imām al-Bukhārī’s Al-Tārikh al-Kabīr is another work of this type.

There are also those who based their biographies on the chronological factor of the dates of deaths of the transmitters, and yet others who used the names of cities and localities to which the narrators belonged. Makka, Madīna, Kūfah, Bāṣra, Wāsiṭ, Damās, Baghdad, Allep, Qayrawān, Būkhārā, Merw, etc., were also home to hadith transmitters and literary figures. This data provides basic tools for hadith criticism and the application of rules pertaining to impugnment and validation (al-jarh wa’l-ta’dīl).

The magnitude of these biographical dictionaries is seen from the large number of persons whose biographies they contain. Al-Bukhārī’s Al-Tārikh al-Kabīr, which is the next landmark work after that of Ibn Sa’d dealt with over 40,000 traditionists. No complete manuscript of this work is, however, known to exist. Only sections of it have been preserved. Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī (d. 463 H) gave in his Tārikh Baghdād, short biographies of 7,831 persons, whereas Ibn Ḥajar al-‘Asqalānī in his Tahdīh al-Tuhdīh and Mizān al-‘ītīdāl recorded biographies of 12,415 and 14,443 traditionists respectively.

The initial phase of the tabaqāt literature, which was general and recorded biographies of all narrators of hadith soon led to the writing of more specialised works that focused on certain classes thereof. These works specialised in the biographies of the Companions, or of persons in other periods, and in respect of cities and localities, or according to their ranking on the various criteria of reliability or weakness and so forth.

The results of this research was collected and put together by ʿIZ al-Dīn Ibn al-Athir (d. 630/1230) in Ṣad al-ʿIḥāba which compiled biographies of 7,554 persons in the category of Companions, some of whom were only discovered by him. Ṣad al-ʿIḥāba is considered a work of authority and it was followed in the ninth-century hijra by a more comprehensive work on the subject, namely, Al-Isāba fī Tamyīz al-Ṣaḥāba by Shihāb al-Dīn ʿAlī Ibn Ḥajar al-ʿAsqalānī (d. 852/1448). Ibn Ḥajar has put together the results of the labours of his predecessors.
on the biographies of Companions, criticising them in certain cases and adding to them some of his own findings. His work thus combines a part where correct biographies are recorded of persons who have been wrongly identified as Companions in some other biographical dictionaries.

In the Ḥṣāba and his other works on ḥadith narrators, Ibn Ḥajar has altogether identified twelve classes of narrators from the time of the Companions down to the time when the six major collections were written. All of his biographies are of persons whose ḥadith have been quoted in one or the other of the six collections. These may be summarised as follows. It will be noted at the outset, however, that all of the twelve categories actually fall under the basic three, namely, the Companions, the Followers (tābiʿūn) and the Successors (tābiʿ tābiʿūn). The twelve categories are:

1. Companions, who are sub-divided into various categories.
2. Leading figures among the Followers (kibār al-tābiʿīn), such as Saʿīd b. al-Musayyib, ʿAlqama and Ḥasan al-Baṣrī.
3. The upper middle category of Followers, such as Muḥammad b. Sirīn, Ḥafṣa bint Sirīn, and ʿAmr bint ʿAbd al-Raḥmān.
4. Lower middle category of the Followers, who narrated mostly from the Followers (not Companions), such as al-Zuhri and Qatāda.
5. The junior category of Followers, who may not have heard directly from the Companions, such as Aḥmad.
6. Those who accompanied the fifth category but who have not met with the Companions, such as Ibn Jurayj.
7. The leading Successors (kubhār athāʾ al-tābiʿīn), such as Mālik b. Anas and Sufyān al-Thawrī.
8. The upper middle category of Successors, such as Ibn ʿUyayna and Ibn ʿUlayya.
9. The junior category of Successors, such as al-Shāfiʿī, and Abū Dāwūd al-Ṭayyālī.
10. Leading literary figures who narrated from junior Successors who had not met the Followers, such as Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal.
11. Upper middle among the tenth category, such as al-Bukhārī.
12. Junior figures among the tenth who quoted the Successors, such as al-Tirmidhī.
A perusal of this list is enough to show that the categories tend to overlap and grey areas have persistently been noted and invited attention from researchers who tried to minimise them. The overlap that is noted is not necessarily a function of ambiguity but a combination of factors that renders the same person eligible to be listed in more than one category. Note, for example, the first tabaga, namely of the Companions, who are classified in about a dozen sub-categories on the basis either of their seniority in embracing Islam, migration to Madina, participation in the various Battles, the ten to whom the Prophet gave the tiding of admission to Paradise (al-‘ashara al-mubashshara) and so on, and now consider the first Caliph Abū Bakr or his Successor ‘Umar, who belonged to many of these categories. Overlaps of a similar order can also be seen among the Followers and Successors.

It is suggested that the last of the Companions was Abū Ṭufayl ‘Āmir b. Wāthila al-Laythi who died in the year 100 of the hijra, and the last of the Followers is one who has seen the last living Companion. Abū Ṭufayl ‘Āmir b. Wāthila died in Makka and the last person among the Followers who met him was Khalaf b. Khalifa who died in 181 hijra and this also marked the ending of the period of the Followers. The Successors’ period is considered to have ended at the year 220 H; included among them were the Imāms Mālik and al-Shāfi‘i. Imām Ahmad b. Ḥanbal (d. 241) belongs to the succeeding generation, that is, next to the Successors, whereas Imām Abū Ḥanifa (d. 150 H) belongs to the category of the Followers as he met some of the junior Companions like Anas b. Mālik, Jābir b. ‘Abd Allāh and others.

About seven persons among the Companions are known to have narrated a major portion of hadith from the Prophet, a fact which earned them the epithet mukthhirū al-ḥadīth (prolific narrators of hadith) as opposed to those who transmitted little notwithstanding their recognised status as leading figures among them. Anyone who narrated more than one thousand ḥadīth from the Prophet belongs to the category of prolific narrators and these are Abū Hurayra who narrated (5,374) aḥādīth, ‘Abd Allāh b. ‘Umar (2,630) aḥādīth, Anas b. Mālik (2,286) aḥādīth, ‘Āisha Siddīqa (2,210) aḥādīth, ‘Abd Allāh b. ‘Abbās (1,660), Jābir b. ‘Abd Allāh (1,540) and Abū Sa‘īd al-Khudri (1,170) aḥādīth. The most learned among the Companions were ‘Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, ‘Ali, Ubayy b. Ka‘b, Zayd b. Thābit, Abū al-
Dardâ' (some say Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī instead of Abū al-Dardā’), and ‘Abd Allāh b. Mas‘ūd, and the two selected names from among these were ‘Alī and Ibn Mas‘ūd."

Abū Bakr, the first Caliph, and lifetime friend and Companion of the Prophet has narrated about one hundred and forty-two ḥadīth, which is said to be due to his early death at a time when ḥadīth narration had not yet become the focus of attention.
"Muṣṭalaḥ al-ḥadīth" denotes two different meanings, one of which is general and the other more specific. As a general term, "Muṣṭalaḥ al-ḥadīth" is often used as an equivalent term to ʿulūm al-ḥadīth, both of which refer to the entire body of ḥadīth methodology and science. The whole discipline began with the purpose mainly of stemming the tide of forgery in ḥadīth with the aid of a carefully worked out methodology and rules by which to isolate the forgeries. More specifically "Muṣṭalaḥ al-ḥadīth" refers to technical terms, names and phrases that the discipline has developed over time, and it is in this latter sense that the term is used in the present context.

Ḥadīth literature is replete with technical terms of the kind that even a native Arabic speaker without expert knowledge of the subject cannot be expected to comprehend. Some of the technical terms pertaining to ḥadīth have already been discussed in the preceding sections of this book. As will be noted, matters pertaining to reliability of the chain of isnād and also the meaning and linguistic clarity of ḥadīth have moved from simple categories and classifications to shades of meaning and nuances of linguistic refinement over the various stages of development in ḥadīth literature. The terminology that is developed as a result has in the course of time gained general recognition so that the mere use of a term such as musnad, mutaṣīl, marfūʿ, mursal, muqṭūʿ, munqāṭiʿ, muṣallas and so on is enough to convey full identification of the type of hadith and relative strength and weakness of its chain of isnād. From the dictionary perspective some of these words carry identical or near-identical meanings but technically they are very different.
Mustalah al-hadith is one of the most, if not the most, significant areas of hadith learning in that it consists mainly of the names of things. It is the embodiment in many ways of the sum-total of the rest of the hadith sciences and communicative, as such, of the end-result of its related disciplines. IIm mustalah al-hadith also serves to depict the cumulative scholarship of the men of learning over the history of developments in hadith studies. The refinement of thought and levels of distinction in hadith terminology are also indicative of the nature of the issues that were encountered in these stages. Hadith sciences have grown along different lines and directions which tend to be somewhat less than consolidated. Mustalah al-hadith may be said to be the one branch of the hadith studies that seeks to bring all of the other branches into focus and provide the reader with an efficient lead-in to the knowledge of the entire discipline.

The discussion that follows provides a brief description of the hadith terminology relating to basic terms, hadith literature, hadith types and classification from the viewpoints of both transmission (rivāya) and meaning (dalāla). This also includes titles of the hadith scholars, that is, the alqāb al-muhaddithīn, whereas the genres of hadith literature, or asmāʾ kutub al-hadīth, have been discussed under the documentation of hadith in a previous chapter.

Basic Terms: Sunna, Khabar, Athar, Hadith and Hadith Qudsi

Sunna literally means a trodden path, or tariqa, a precedent and exemplary conduct. Although Sunna can mean a bad example or precedent as well as a good one, it is often the latter which the Sunna conveys. Bidʿa (innovation), which is the opposite of Sunna is used often in the sense of a pernicious innovation which departs from the accepted precedent, or Sunna. Although many have considered Sunna and hadith to be synonymous, others have reserved Sunna for practical examples and hadith for verbal expressions of the Sunna. Sunna also differs from hadith in that Sunna refers to the ruling or hukm that is conveyed in a hadith, whereas hadith is the verbal carrier of Sunna, the words and phrases, in other words, in which the Sunna has been communicated and expressed.
Hadith literally means ‘speech’ and also ‘new’, which is the opposite of ‘qadim’. Since speech is created as it is uttered by the speaker, it is known as ḥadith. Thus the sayings of the Prophet were known as ḥadith in contradistinction with the Qurʼān, which was qadim. Ḥadith as such is the verbal embodiment and vehicle of Sunna. After the demise of the Prophet, people engaged in speech about him so much that the word ḥadith was eventually reserved for speech concerning the Prophet, including his own speech. This may also explain that in the early stages, the sayings of Companions and even Followers were included in ḥadith, which is still the case to some extent. Although ḥadith is the verbal carrier of Sunna, not every ḥadith contains Sunna, that is, a ḥukm and exemplary conduct. This distinction between Sunna and ḥadith is still valid, but it was more significant in the early stages of the development of ḥadith studies. The distinction has lost some of its meaning after al-Shāfiʿi who insisted that every Sunna must be verified and established by an authentic ḥadith, which to all intents and purposes was equivalent to saying that there is no Sunna if it cannot be proven through a validly transmitted ḥadith that is supported by a reliable isnād.

The view has generally gained ground among the scholars of ḥadith, especially the latecomers (mutaʼakhkhirūn) among them that ḥadith and Sunna are two words for the same meaning and that both include the saying, act and tacit approval of the Prophet. Yet background historical developments tend to draw subtle distinctions between them which may now be said to be of historical interest and would carry little, if any, religious or juridical weight. Yet a brief review of background developments in terminology is useful for purposes of understanding. Sunna was seen to have a stronger base in actual reality and practice, and it was basically in this sense that the word occurred in the saying, as it is reported, of the Prophet:

You are to follow my Sunna and the Sunna of the rightly-guided caliphs after me.

عليكم بعندتي وسنة الخلفاء الراشدين من بعدي.

Some have even asserted that Sunna basically means actual conduct and that Sunna does not include verbal statements. They say that this was what Sunna had meant during the time of the Prophet and the Companions. This is, however, not accepted and it is generally held that Sunna is a general term that includes both the saying and action of the Prophet. To say this is also in harmony with the Qurʾān: When the Qurʾān assigns to the Prophet the role to explain to the people what God has revealed (al-Naḥl, 16:44), it is understood that the Prophet explained the messages of the Qurʾān in words and action both. Besides, a person’s statements, words, and conduct often become a part of one another and a realistic distinction would be difficult to maintain between them.

Sunna has meant different things to the ḥadith scholars, the jurists, and the usūl scholars respectively. To the ʿulamāʾ of usūl, Sunna primarily signifies a proof and source of the Sharīʿa next to the Qurʾān and it comprises the sayings, acts and tacit approval of the Prophet which contain evidence to establish a ruling or hukm of Sharīʿa. Some usūl scholars have included in Sunna acts and precedent of the Companions whether they followed the Qurʾān or the directives of the Prophet or followed their own ijtihād, such as their action to collate and compile the Qurʾān, for example. Imām Mālik has shown this tendency as he considered the Sunna of the Prophet and the practice of the Companions an extension of one another. Imām Shāfiʿī has, however, criticised his teacher, Imām Mālik, for mixing the Sunna of the Prophet with the conduct of the Companions.2

For the jurists and fiqahāʾ, Sunna primarily signifies a value point below the level of obligation, including everything which the Prophet has authorised by way of recommendation that does not convey an emphatic demand. Sunna as such is equivalent to mandūb that merits a reward when it is followed but omitting it is not punishable. Sunna in this sense is also used in the expression that so and so is a follower of the Sunna, or Aḥī al-Sunna waʾl-Jamāʿa, and also as ritual prayer, such as performing two units of supererogatory prayer, or Sunna.

For the ḥadith scholars and muḥaddithūn, Sunna is not confined to that which conveys a hukm or ruling of Sharīʿa, nor to a proof and source thereof, but comprises all the sayings and acts of the Prophet and his tacit approval, his biography and description of personal attributes, events such as reports of his battles, and news and stories of interest concerning him. The jurists tend to preclude description of the personal attributes of the Prophet from their perception of Sunna. The 'ulamā' of hadith thus tend to include in Sunna almost everything that is attributed to the Prophet and this is Sunna in its widest sense as compared to the 'ulamā' of usūl who discuss Sunna in the context mainly of the proofs of Shari'a.

The fiqhah, refer to Sunna in the context mainly of the rulings, or ahhām, of Shari'a in the determination of what is obligatory (mājib), recommendable (mandūb), permissible (mubah), reprehensible (makrūh) and forbidden (harām). The hadith scholars and jurists have recognised the distinction between Sunna and hadith in the typical statement, for example, that “this hadith is contrary to qiyās, Sunna and consensus” (hadhā‘l-hadith mukhālif li‘l-qiyās wa‘l-Sunna wa‘l-ijmā‘), Sunna as such refers to the normative and exemplary conduct of the Prophet which is a recognised source of the Shari'a.

Sunna is divided into three types, namely verbal Sunna (Sunna qawmīyya) which is now synonymous with hadith and, by far, the largest part of Sunna consists of this type. This is followed by actual Sunna (Sunna fi‘liyya) which consists of reports concerning the acts of the Prophet. What the Prophet has tacitly approved falls under the tacitly approved Sunna (Sunna taqrīriyya). This too is a broad category as it included customary practices of the Arabs which came to the Prophet’s attention but which he did not overrule. Tacit Sunna also included acts and conduct of the Companions that the Prophet allowed or did not overrule when they caught his attention.

Khabar literally means a report or verbal communication and announcement of a factual event, and it thus bears a meaning that is closer to hadith than Sunna. For there can be no hadith without a khabar, as hadith basically consists of a report of the saying and exemplary conduct of the Prophet. Yet there is a difference between khabar and hadith in that every hadith consists of what originates from the Prophet and comes from him, whereas khabar is what comes from others concerning him. Every hadith may also be said to be a khabar but not every khabar is a hadith. “Khabar” in the expression “ṣikhabrī” is employed in reference to a historian in contradistinction to a muhaddith, that is, a scholar of hadith. The Shī‘a ‘ulamā’ tend to use khabar more widely than their Sunni counterparts often in preference to hadith. This is because the Shī‘a include within the general meaning of ḥadīth and khabar the sayings, not only of the Prophet, but also of their recognised Imāms as they are deemed to have inherent knowledge of the Sunna of the Prophet. Ḥadīth to the Shi‘īs thus signifies a wider meaning, and khabar as a term is used by them to include ḥadīth proper as well as the sayings of the Imāms. Yet there is a tendency among Shi‘ī writers to use the word Sunna in reference to the Sunna of the Prophet only.

Athār literally means imprint, relic or vestage that is inherited from the past. It is often used synonymously with ḥadīth, both of which imply valid precedent, but athār is wider than hadīth in that it includes all that is attributed to the Prophet, his Companions, Followers and other leading figures. However, some scholars of hadīth, especially the non-Arabs from Khurāsān and Persia, have reserved athār for the sayings and precedent of the Companions only. An equivalent term to athār, which is commonly employed, is khabar mawqūf, that is, what a Companion has indicated to be a part of the Sunna but whose chain of isnād does not reach the Prophet himself.¹

Ḥadīth Qudsi: This is a variety of ḥadīth in which the Prophet speaks to his community and relates what he says directly to God Most High. Ḥadīth Qudsi (also known as Ḥadīth Ilāhi and Ḥadīth Rabbānī) is thus distinguished from al-Ḥadīth al-Nabawī, or ḥadīth of the Prophet, in that the speaker in the former is God Most High whereas in the latter it is the Prophet himself. When the Prophet says, for example that “God Most High said” and in what follows there are also parts which read such as “O my servants (yā `ibādi)” – the question arises as to whether this should be regarded as part of the Qur`ān or of the ḥadīth of the Prophet. Some have said such ḥadīth partially resembles the Qur`ān and it also partakes in ḥadīth. It is called Ḥadīth Qudsi because the speech is attributed to God Most High wherein the Prophet simply acts as a carrier of the divine message. Although the word “quds” in the Qur`ān has been used in reference to the Archangel Gabriel (cf. al-Nahl, 16:102) qudsi in the present context is used in its literal sense which conveys the sense of purity and holiness in reference to God Most High. But even so there is a difference between Ḥadīth Qudsi and the Qur`ān, which is that the Qur`ān is the speech of God that is conveyed to the Prophet by the Archangel Gabriel in the form of manifest wahy (wahy zāhir) in the words of God, whereas the words of Hadith Qudsi are those of the Prophet himself and they are not revealed in the form of wahy zahir, but revealed to him through inspiration of idea and concept.

The words of the Prophet do not command the same spiritual ranking as the text of the Qur'an. This also explains why only the Qur'an, but not the Hadith Qudsi, may be recited in the five daily prayers, or any other salah that a Muslim performs. It is a requirement also that the Qur'an should be read in a state of ablation, but this is not required for Hadith Qudsi. A total of just over 100 Qudsi hadith have been transmitted and there are some hadith collections that consist exclusively of this type of hadith. The early ulama' (salaf) usually opened the Hadith Qudsi with a phrase such as “qāla Rasūl Allāh jīmā yarmī ‘an rabbih” (the Messenger of God said while reporting from God). But the scholars of the later period (khalaf) substituted this by the typical statement qāla Allāhu ta'ālā jīmā rawāhu ‘anhu Rasūl Allāh (God Most High said in what the Messenger of God narrated from Him). The source in both cases is God Most High. Hadith Qudsi may be illustrated as follows:

1. God Most High said: O My servants! I have forbidden injustice unto Myself and also prohibited it to you. So do not be unjust amongst yourselves.

قال الله تعالى: يا عبادي! إنني حرمت الظلم على نفسي وجعلته محرماً بينكم فلا تظلموا...

2. Sometimes a hadith Qudsi is merged into a hadith nabawi, as in the following example:

All deeds of the progeny of Adam are multiplied, the good deeds are multiplied ten-fold upwards to seven hundred times. God Most High said except for fasting, for this is for Me alone and I reward it Myself. It is for My sake that My servant abandons his sexual desire and food. One who fasts experiences two joys, one when he opens his fast and the other when he meets Me.

كل عمل ابن آدم يضاعف، الحسنة عشر أمثالها إلى سبعمئة ضعف، قال الله تعالى: إلا الصوم فإنه لي وأنا أجزيه به من يدع عليه وطعامه لأجله...
From the viewpoint of its authenticity, ḥadīth Qudsī is measured by the same criteria as any other ḥadīth, and it may thus be classified as Sound, Fair or Weak, just as it may be classified as elevated (Maṣṭūḥ), suspended, or broken (Mawqūf, Maṣṭūḥ) and also as Mutamātir or Āḥād. This is also indicative of a difference between ḥadīth Qudsī and the Qur’ān in that the text of the Qur’ān is authentic beyond question, all of which is Mutamātir, whereas this is not the case with most of the ḥadīth Qudsī.

Al-Riwāya wa’l-Dirāya (Transmission and Meaning)

Riwāya (lit. reporting or narration), refers to transmission of ḥadīth and the soundness and continuity or otherwise of its isnād, and also the manner in which the ḥadīth was received, retained and delivered, or subjected to validation and impugnment, etc., without looking into the meaning and implications of the text of ḥadīth. Dirāya on the other hand is concerned with the truth, meaning and message of the ḥadīth, and the law or ruling that is conveyed by the text. To establish the accuracy of the text of ḥadīth is naturally the end-result of the enquiry over the transmission and meaning. Riwāya and dirāya are therefore not separate from one another as they both seek to establish the authenticity of ḥadīth and accuracy of its message.

Sanad, Isnād, Musnad

Literally ‘sanad’ means a pillar or support, and in reference to ḥadīth it refers to all the individuals and persons who transmitted ḥadīth from the Prophet and then from one another until it reaches us. Musnad, which is the active participle of the same root word (sanada) refers to the individual narrator that is included in the sanad, whereas isnād, which is the verbal noun of the same root refers to the chain of transmission of ḥadīth and it is, in this sense, synonymous with sanad. Musnad is thus the carrier of ḥadīth and it is synonymous with rāwī (narrator). ‘Isnād’ is sometimes used to signify the activity that is involved in attributing the ḥadīth to its narrators in every generation.

‘Musnad’ which is the passive participle of sanada refers to ḥadīth that is supported by a chain of transmission or isnād. According to the preferable view, the chain of transmission in Musnad is also connected from beginning to end all the way back to the Prophet. It is a ḥadīth, in other words, that is both Muttaṣīl (connected) and Marfūʿ (elevated). Musnad as such precludes ḥadīth with a broken isnād or one that does not reach the Prophet himself. Musnad in other words, precludes Mawqūf (suspended), Mursal and disconnected (ghayr muttaṣīl) ḥadīth. To say that the isnād of Musnad ḥadīth is connected all the way means that every narrator therein heard or received it through a valid method of reception from his teacher or shaykh. Musnad is not synonymous with Marfūʿī in that every Musnad is a Marfūʿ but every Marfūʿ does not necessarily qualify as Musnad. Al-Ḥākim al-Nīṣābūrī also adds that the isnād of Musnad must also be clear of tādīs or hidden ambiguity that causes doubt about its reliability.

Although some ḥadīth scholars have equated Marfūʿī with Musnad, it is a weak opinion. This is because Marfūʿī can also include disconnected ḥadīth which cannot therefore qualify as Musnad.⁶

Al-Matn

Literally matn means support. It is the verbal noun of matana which means strengthening or fortifying something, and in this context it refers to a ḥadīth that is supported by a text. Matn refers to the text or body of ḥadīth and it is used in contradistinction with isnād, which is a different aspect of providing support for ḥadīth, namely, through a chain of transmission.

Ranking and Titles of Ḥadīth Scholars (alqāb al-muḥaddithīn)

The ʿulamāʾ have identified a number of ranks in the accomplishment and erudition of ḥadīth in an ascending order, beginning with the musnad, as follows:

a. Musnad (the active participle of isnād) refers to a person who engages himself in the transmission of ḥadīth and this is acceptable even if he has little knowledge either of the isnād or the meaning that is conveyed by the ḥadīth. Sometimes the term muḥtadī (novice) is used as an equivalent. A step more advanced to Musnad is the tālib alhadith (lit. seeker of hadith), an expression which is used in reference to a student of hadith who engages himself in acquiring knowledge of the rimāya, dirāya and other aspects of usūl al-hadith.

b. Muḥaddith (learned in hadith): This title is given to one who knows the strengths and weaknesses both of the isnād and the text of the hadith and hidden defects (al-‘īlal) therein. A muḥaddith is also expected to be familiar with the six renowned collections of hadith and has, it is said, committed to memory at least one thousand aḥādīth from the six collections.2

c. Ḥāfiz: Literally retentive of memory or a memoriser, one who has committed to memory all the Sahih/Sound aḥādīth and cites it from memory when the occasion arises. The term refers to one who possesses wider knowledge of hadith than that of a muḥaddith. A Ḥāfiz is a person who is well-informed about the conditions of the transmitters and isnād and can evaluate reliability or weakness of the narrators of hadith in every generation just as he can ascertain strength and weakness in the ijīthād of other scholars. He is knowledgeable of the terminology of hadith and can ascertain nuances of expression in hadith literature with regard especially to narrators of hadith. A Ḥāfiz conveys a reference to memory, which is naturally important, and even if recourse is made to writing and written record, the role of committing to memory is still emphasised. Some 'ulama' have specified that a Ḥāfiz is expected to have committed to memory 100,000 aḥādīth and some have said even more, whereas others have mentioned a minimum of 20,000 aḥādīth. But it is suggested, rightly perhaps, that these specifications have to some extent been dictated by the prevailing conditions of earlier generations. With the advancement of literacy and other aids to memory, and use of computer, the requirements may be open to adjustment, for it would otherwise be difficult to find people who would qualify for these requirements.3 It would be equally untenable to say that no one would qualify. Such a conclusion would be patently false as it is certain that people of great standing in the knowledge of hadith existed in the past as they also continue to exist. It would thus be advisable for us to attach greater credibility to the knowledge and insight, to dirāya, rather than to rimāya, in our own times. For the titles that were specified in the past may not even be accurate to apply after the compilation and documentation of hadith on a massive scale. What is important now is to carry the meaning and message of those evaluative designations and not be too specific perhaps on their quantitative specifications, which might in any case, have been mentioned for the sake of emphasis rather than literal application. Would it not be taxing for any one person to memorise hundreds of thousands of ahādīth with their isnāds? What we are saying here also applies to the next two ranks, namely of Hujja and Ḥākim.

d. Hujja: literally proof, and it refers to a degree of erudition in ḥadith that ranks above that of the ḥāfīz. Hujja thus refers to a person whose knowledge of ḥadith is comprehensive and insightful in addition, that is, to possessing the necessary qualifications of a ḥāfīz. Some have specified committing to memory for a Hujja of 300,000 ahādīth together with their isnāds.

e. Ḥākim. Ḥākim signifies the highest degree of erudition in ḥadith which is all-round and comprehensive and comprises a high level of competence in ḥadith in all of its various branches such as al-jarḥ wa'l-ta'dīl, 'īdal al-ḥadīth, gharīb al-ḥadīth, the abrogator and abrogated and so forth. A ḥākim is also described as one who has committed to memory all the reported ḥadīth on record together with their isnāds in all the Sahīh as well as the Hasan and Da'īf categories and can distinguish and isolate the fabricated or mawdū'a from other ahādīth.

These were some of the basic terms in Muṣṭalah al-Ḥadīth, which are by no means exhaustive. The various classifications of hadith in the three varieties of Sahīh, Hasan and Da'īf as well as their sub-varieties into a much larger range and, of course, Mutawātir, Mashhūr and Āḥād also fall within the purview of Muṣṭalah al-Ḥadīth. These are not discussed here as they will be addressed in their appropriate contexts in the various sections of this book. What follows next is an extension basically of ḥadith terminology, or Muṣṭalah al-Ḥadīth. I continue first with the classification of hadith into Sound, Fair and Weak (Sahīh, Hasan, and Da'īf respectively), whereas the section that follows addresses a variety of other classifications ranging from elevated (Marfu‘), to suspended (Mawqūf), solitary (Fard), strong ('Azīz) to Mutawātir and Āḥād.
ALTHOUGH the Prophet, peace be on him, has in principle encouraged diffusion of the knowledge of his teachings and Sunna, he has in the meantime warned the believers in such terms: “If anyone tells a lie about me intentionally, let him be sure of his place in the Hell fire”. In another hadith he is reported to have said: “If anyone speaks of a hadith in my name while knowing that I have not said it, he is a liar”. These and similar other warnings influenced the Companions and subsequent generations of Muslims to exercise caution in the transmission of hadith. The Companions were consequently careful not to narrate hadith of which they were doubtful. Instances are on record to show that the Rightly-Guided Caliphs were careful, and often solicited evidence, to clarify doubt in the rendering and transmission of hadith. Quoted in support of taking a cautious approach to the verification of hadith was also the Qur’anic aya addressing the believers “when a transgressor (fāsiq) comes to you with news, then investigate (its veracity) so that people are not afflicted with adversity due to ignorance and then you regret what you have done” (al-Hujurat, 49:6). What is emphasised here is to investigate and verify reports in all cases especially when they are conveyed by persons of compromised integrity. Do not, in other words, dismiss such reports prior to investigation and out of ignorance. Since hadith that is reported from the Prophet falls within the purview of this directive, taking an inquisitive approach toward hadith was thus justified.

Another Qur’anic passage that is quoted in this context is the one which validates the testimony of two persons for proof of unsubstantiated claims (al-Baqara, 2:282). Narration and transmission of ḥadith are no less important than testimony and they are both accepted only from upright and trustworthy individuals. Owing to the great sensitivity of this matter, some 'ulamā' went so far as to say that intentional propagation of lies in the name of ḥadith amounted to disbelief (kufr) and validated the death punishment for its perpetrator. The spread of ḥadith to the remote parts of the Islamic domain is also known to have given rise to apprehensions on the part of the 'ulamā' over error and distortion in ḥadith, which is why they began to address the problem by recourse to rigorous criticism of the reliability of the narrator of ḥadith and the textual accuracy of his reports. A separate branch of ḥadith studies, known as al-jarh wa'l-ta'dil (impugnment and validation – also known as nāqūd al-ḥadīth) was developed as a result and numerous writers contributed to the growth of interest and literature in this field. This branch of the ḥadith studies is concerned mainly with the reliability or otherwise of the transmitters of ḥadith and compiles information which either proves them as upright and reliable, or else weak and unreliable. Ever since the time of the Companions scholars have continued to contribute to the development of al-jarh wa'l-ta'dil.

A number of prominent Companions, including Abū Bakr, 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, 'Āli b. Abī Ṭalīb, 'Abd Allāh b. 'Abbās (d. 96 H), Anas b. Mālik (d. 93), 'Ubāda b. al-Šāmit, and 'A'isha as well as scholars among the tābiʿūn, such as Saʿīd b. Jubayr (d. 95), Saʿīd b. al-Musayyib (d. 99) al-Shaʿbi (d. 104 H) and Ibn Sirin (d. 110) are associated with the development of this branch of the hadith and they are known to have spoken concerning the reliability of reports by individuals, whom they have either approved or disapproved. But works of scholarship on the subject were not written until the third century hijra. Yahyā b. Maʿin (d. 233 H), Imām Ahmad b. Ḥanbal (d. 241 H) and 'Alī b. al-Madini (d. 234) were the early pioneers who wrote on the subject and then almost all the leading Imāms of hadith including al-Bukhārī (d. 256), Muslim, Abū Dāwūd and al-Nasāʾi have to their credit written one or more books on the biographies of ḥadith transmitters and their works and thus contributed to the development of al-jarh wa'l-ta'dil during the third century.

A comprehensive work on al-jarh wa'l-ta'dil is Kitāb al-Tabaqāt al-Kabīr of Ibn Saʿīd al-Zuhri al-Bāṣrī (d. 230 H) in 15 volumes in which the author compiled biographies of over 4,000 narrators of ḥadīth. Due to the growth of literature, some writers specialised their works either to al-ḍarḥ (impugnment) or to al-ṭa‘dīl (validation) and many others addressed both as two sides of the same coin. There were also works that only focused on the transmitters of the six famous collections, and some only on the narrators of al-Bukhārī, or of Muslim and so forth. Al-Bukhārī himself wrote three books on the subject of al-ḍarḥ wa‘l-ṭa‘dīl, one of which is entitled Al-Ḍu‘ā‘a wa‘l-Matrūkīn (the weak and abandoned) and compiled information on a much larger number of narrators. More recent works of authority on the subject included the four-volume Mizān al-I‘tidāl by Shams al-Dīn Muḥammad b. ‘Abd al-Dhahabī (d. 748 H) which compiled data on (11,053) individuals, and Ḥāfiz Ibn Ḥajar al-‘Asqalānī’s (d. 852), Līsān al-Mīzān in six volumes containing data on (14,343) ḥadīth transmitters. Works of scholarship that emerged after the third century generally followed and upheld the conclusions of the early pioneers of this discipline. The early scholars also tend to fare better on the scale of validation and reliability than their successors in the subsequent generations.

The ‘ulamā‘ are not unanimous in their assessment of the character and qualifications of the transmitters of ḥadīth. While some like Yahyā b. Ma‘īn (d. 233), and Yahyā b. Sa‘īd al-Qaṭṭān (d. 198 H) were strict in their assessment of the reliability of narrators, others like Abū ʻĪsā al-Tirmidhī and al-Ḥākim al-Nisābūrī (d. 405 H) were not so strict, while Ahmad b. Ḥanbal (d. 241), al-Bukhārī (d. 256) and Muslim (d. 261) were considered to be moderate. Hence their respective assessments of the various narrators tend to vary. The Sunnī and Shī‘ī scholars have, moreover, taken different approaches to the reliability of narrators of ḥadīth. There are also differences that emanate from ijtiḥād. The traditionists (ahl al-ḥadīth) have, rightly or wrongly, discredited some ‘utamā‘ among the Rationalists (ahl al-ra‘y) because of their differential approaches to ijtiḥād.

The assassination of the Caliph ʿUthmān and the ensuing civil war between the Caliph ʿAlī and Mu‘āwiya in the year 41 hijra is widely known to have marked the beginning of forgery in ḥadīth primarily for political purposes of crediting or discrediting a certain individual, party or doctrine. This naturally led to greater restrictions and a more critical attitude toward the dissemination and transmission of ḥadīth.
With regard to ascertaining the textual accuracy of hadith, the principal tool that the ‘ulamā’ applied was comparison and cross-examination. By gathering all the hadith on a certain subject and other data relating to time, place and particular individuals and then carefully comparing the relevant parts with one another, the ‘ulamā’ were able to evaluate the accuracy of hadith and reliability of their reporters. Some of the methods that were applied were as follows:

1. Comparison between the ahādīth of the different students of one scholar.
2. Comparison between the statements of a single scholar at different times.
3. Comparison between oral recitation and written documents.
4. Comparison between the hadith and the relevant text of the Qurʾān.

To give an illustration, Yahyā b. Maʿīn (158-233 AH) tried to authenticate the written work on hadith of Ḥammād b. Salama of Baṣra (d. 167), and this took him to Baṣra where he checked the text with many of Ḥammād’s students (18 students altogether) and then said in a conversation to one of them (Mūsā b. Ismāʿil) that Ḥammād made mistakes and his students added some more to his, and that he wanted to distinguish who made which mistakes. Ibn Maʿīn tried to identify the source of the mistakes through comparison and cross reference: if all the students of Ḥammād had made the same error, Ḥammād was the likely source, but if they differed in making the same error, the error was likely to have originated with the student himself. Ibn Maʿīn’s enquiry also enabled him, in addition to identifying the specific errors, to grade the various students of Ḥammād and determine their accuracy in reporting.7

Both Imāms, Muslim and his teacher al-Bukhārī, have authored separate works on hadith criticism. In a hadith that Muslim has investigated, Ibn ʿAbbās reported that on one occasion he prayed alone behind the Prophet and started to stand on his left side, but the Prophet turned him, to change sides from his left to his right side. This incident was then reported by the scholar Yazīd b. Abī Zīnād, from Kurayb, from Ibn ʿAbbās stating that Ibn ʿAbbās stood on the right side of the Prophet and he was then made to stand on the left side. There was obviously an error. So Imām Muslim gathered all the statements of the students of Kurayb, and then he collected all the statements of Ibn 'Abbās and established that Ibn 'Abbās had changed sides from the left to the right, not vice versa. Then he compared this with other reports by the Companions who had prayed with the Prophet when alone, and found out that Yazid b. Abi Zinād had made a mistake.

Whenever the reliability of the ḥadith transmitter is questioned and a probing is attempted into his character and knowledge, two possibilities are envisaged, one of which is that the available evidence supports his reliability and uprightness. This is referred to as taʿdīl, or proving someone to be upright and 'adl. The other possibility is to establish by evidence that the transmitter is unreliable, or that his uprightness and 'adāla is unproven. This is referred to as al-.jarḥ which literally means wounding. The methods by which al-jarḥ is invoked and established are more rigorous than what is usually required in taʿdīl. The 'ulamāʾ of ḥadith have often confirmed the transmitter of ḥadith to be acceptable and upright without actually inquiring into the detailed grounds of their conclusions. To establish the reliability of a person may be due to numerous reasons which may be difficult to elaborate. For otherwise the validator (muʿdīl) may be saying things such as “he did not do this, did not tell a lie, he did do such and such” and the list may become lengthy. Yet validation, or taʿdīl, is not accepted if it is too vague. Thus if a validator does not identify the narrator and simply writes that “a reliable person informed me,” it is not enough, although according to a minority view, this may be acceptable from a prominent scholar.

As for the question whether validation or impugnment is acceptable from only one, or from a minimum of two persons, there is an opinion to the effect that like testimony in judicial disputes, the minimum requirement here too is affirmation by two persons. But the correct view is that jarḥ or taʿdīl can both be proven by the affirmation of one person.

As for the terminology that is used in taʿdīl, some 'ulamāʾ, including Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ and Ibn Abī Ḥātim al-Rāzī (d. 327 H), have used slightly different expressions to the six that are listed below. If someone approves of a narrator in words such as ‘thiqā’ or ‘mutqin’ (reliable, firm), his report is acceptable. Approval is also indicated by words such as ‘thabtun, hujjatun’ (proof, strong evidence), and even more so if words such as ‘ḥāṣṣ’ and ‘dābit’ (retentive, unwavering) are used. These expressions indicate the first degree of ta‘dīl, whereas expressions such as ‘ṣādūq’ and ‘ṣāliḥ al-hadīth’ (fit to be a ḥadīth narrator) and ‘lā-bā‘sa bihi’ (no objection) tend to come next.9

Impugnment, or al-jarh, is also verified by the use of terms and expressions as will presently be discussed. In the case of jārh, it is necessary, as already noted, that a reference is made to the grounds or causes of jārh. People tend to vary in their assessment of what they may regard to be a valid ground of jārh, but even here, there has been a tendency toward avoidance of detail in specifying the grounds of al-jarh. The ‘ulamā‘ have often made brief statements that “so and so is weak (da‘if) or mattrūk (abandoned)” and the like without giving much detail. Brief comments of this type often fell short of explaining or specifying the grounds of jārh, but they succeeded nevertheless in casting doubt on the reliability of their subjects.10 Hadīth critics are also noted for having paid attention to what may be called profane mubahāt, such as indulgence in jokes, eating on public thoroughfares, playing chess, listening to music, or playing a musical instrument. It is known that a narrator’s indulgence in music and chess hardly failed to disqualify him from being a narrator of hadīth. It is of interest to note that al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī has a chapter in Al-Kifāya in which he elaborates on what is not suitable nor valid to be considered as a ground for jārh.11

Pursuit of pernicious innovation (bid‘a) and indulgence in capricious opinion (kamā) also counted as grounds of al-jarh. When a narrator of ḥadīth became known for these, or known for fraudulent dealings and dishonesty in financial transactions, his report did not fail to be downgraded or abandoned.12 There has been a tendency on the other hand of taking a lenient view of any weakness that might have been noted concerning well-known figures whose uprightness had become common knowledge. The ‘adāla, for example, of the leading Imāms of jurisprudence, al-Awzā‘ī (d. 157), ‘Ali b. al-Madīnī (d. 234), Yahyā b. Mā‘īn (d. 233) and others was taken for granted and was hardly, if ever, questioned. Another tendency to be noted in the discussion of al-jarh ma‘l-ta‘dīl is that the higher links in the chain of transmission, who were closer to the source, were given greater credibility and recognition than the lower links. The scholars of hadith thus tended to scrutinise reports by their contemporaries or narrators of later generations more stringently compared to, for example, narrators who belonged to the tābiʿūn or even the tābiʿīn.

Yahyā b. Maʿin has specified four qualities in a narrator of hadith, namely truthfulness, willingness to authenticate hadith, abandonment of pernicious innovations (al-bidʿa), and avoidance of grave sins (al-kabāʿir). As for the truthfulness of a narrator or his avoidance of sin, it is generally acknowledged that no one is totally clear of sin and if one were to require total probity, no one is likely to qualify. It is also agreed that hadith is not accepted from those who indulge in criminality and transgression. God Most High has ordained acceptance of reports by an upright person and rejection thereof by a transgressor.

There are clear statements in the hadīth of the Prophet on the identification of a number of sins into grave sins, but these al-kabāʿir are not exclusive. In one hadīth, the Prophet has warned the believers of seven devastating sins (al-sabʿ al-mābiqāʾi). The Companions then asked as to what were they and the Prophet, peace be on him, said that they were “associating another deity with God, sorcery, slaying a life that God has made sacrosanct except in the cause of justice, usury, devouring the property of orphans, staying away from jihād, and slanderous accusation of chaste women with zina.”

اجتربوا السبع الموبقاتِ، قيل: يارسول الله ماهي؟ قال: الشرك بله والسحر وقتل النفس التي حرم الله إلا بالحق وأكل الربا وأكل مال اليتيم والتولي يوم الزحف وقذف المحصنات الغافلات المؤمنات.

In another hadīth on the same subject, it is provided that “the gravest of all sins before God on the Day of Resurrection is association with Him, slaying a believer without a just cause, escape from jihād in the way of God, and renunciation by one’s parents.”

إن أكبر الكبائر عند الله يوم القيامة الإشراك بله وقتل النفس المؤمنة بغير حق والفرار من سبيل الله يوم الزحف وعقول الوالدين.
A similar hadith on the subject of grave sins adds one more, namely false testimony (shahādat al-zār). To this list, the 'ulamā' of hadith have added drinking, sodomy, fraud and other prescribed offences when they are proven by the testimony of two just witnesses. Anyone who has deliberately lied concerning a hadith or is involved in forgery is disqualified for ever and may never be admitted again even if he repents and corrects himself. As for repentance from other major sins, it may qualify the repenter again when his sincerity and good conduct becomes known and established beyond doubt.

When a reliable person narrates a hadith from an equally reliable person and then the latter denies it in definite expressions such as "I did not narrate it, or he lied," or the like, then there would be a clash of two decisive statements, one of affirmation and the other of negation. Negation prevails in this case and the hadith concerning affirmation is rejected. But if the teacher in question merely says "I do not recognise this, or I do not remember," this does not amount to impugnment and the hadith is also not rejected because of it.

When someone narrates a hadith and subsequently forgets what he narrated, this does not amount to impugnment of himself and the hadith he had narrated is also not affected by his forgetfulness. This is the position of the majority of the 'ulamā' of hadith, with the exception of the Hanafis who have rejected a hadith on this very ground. This was the hadith of Sulaymān b. Mūsā from al-Zuhri - 'Urwa - 'Ā'isha from the Prophet: "When a woman concludes a marriage without the permission of her guardian, her nikāh is null and void ..."

Ibn Jurayj has said concerning this hadith that he asked al-Zuhri about it but he did not recognise the hadith. The correct view is, however, that of the majority as many learned authorities are known to have narrated a hadith and then forgot their earlier report. People do tend to forget and this by itself does not amount to impugnment of either the person or of the hadith he had narrated.

As for a narrator who charges a fee for transmitting hadith, some 'ulamā' of hadith have considered this as a ground of impugnment. Ibn al-Śalāh confirmed this and wrote that Ahmad b. Ḥanbal and Abū Ḥātim al-Rāzī have also held the same view. According to a minority view attributed to some scholars, including Abū Ishāq al-Shirāzi, charging a fee in this case is like charging a fee for teaching the Qur'ān, which is not objectionable, especially for someone who may be in need of earning a fee. But even so, charging a fee for transmitting hadith of the Prophet is considered demeaning of the integrity and muğ'a of a person.

The methods that were applied in ḥadith criticism were clearly focused on the reliability of the narrator. To accept a ḥadith according to the criteria of ḥadith criticism, it is not sufficient for the text to be accurate and sound but that it should also be transmitted by an upright ‘adl person of undisputed credibility. The issue at stake is not, in other words, the narrator’s accuracy and care in receiving, retaining and then transmitting the ḥadith but also his upright character and ‘adāla. Individual narrators naturally varied in their abilities and attitudes. To ascertain these, the ‘ulamā’ developed a set of criteria that enabled the grading of ḥadith transmitters initially on the binary scale of impugnment al-jarḥ and validation al-ta‘dīl, each of which were then sub-divided into six sub-headings, or ranks, known respectively as the grades of validation marātib al-ta‘dīl, and grades of impugnment marātib al-jarḥ. There were attempts at the use of uniform terminology for grading purposes, which tended to vary somewhat in the works of various authors and it has evidently taken time for a measure of uniformity to develop. Ibn Ḥajar al-‘Asqalānī (773–852 H) has rendered the relevant terminology as follows:

1. The Companions who stand at the highest point on the scale of ta‘dīl.
2. Thiqāt Dābiṭīn: Unwaveringly trustworthy, accepted beyond question.
3. Thiqār: trustworthy and retentive, inspiring confidence.
4. Ṣadāq: truthful (the word mutaqin is sometimes used by other writers as an equivalent).
5. Ṣadāq yahīm: truthful but prone to making mistakes.
6. Mağbūl: accepted; occasionally the phrase in-sha’ Allāh (God willing) is added. What it means is that there is no proof why his report should not be accepted. The word lāyyin (of little weight) is also occasionally used.
Al-Nawawi and Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ have recorded a four-point scale in a descending order of probity, each of which consists of several terms. The first rank is identified by the following six terms: thiqā (trustworthy), mutaṣin (firm), thabitun (of proven record), ḥujuja (proof), ʿadlan ḥāfiẓun (upright and retentive), and dāhiṣun (retentive). The second rank is identified by ṣādūq (truthful), mahāl al-ṣidq (inclined to truth), lā baʿsa bihi (no objection). These three terms imply a second ranking next to the six terms above as they do not indicate the retentiveness (al-ṣabt) quality of the narrator. The third rank of probity is identified by the use of the term shaykhun, that is an acceptable transmitter but that one may need to look into his report and not to readily accept it. This is equivalent to ṣādūq yahim in al-ʿAsqalānī’s terminology, which we earlier identified as truthful but prone to indulging in untruth (wahm) and making mistakes. The fourth and last rank in this scale is identified by the phrase ṣāḥib al-ḥadīth (fit to transmit hadith but should be verified). This is said to be equivalent to the last point, that is ṣādūq, or maqbul in-shaʾ Allāh in al-ʿAsqalānī’s terminology.\(^{24}\)

The probity (‘adāla) of a person is established by his good reputation and acceptance of his ḥadīth by the ‘ulamāʾ and scholars, or when the latter speak well of the narrator, praise him, and express confidence in his work. Leading figures such as Imāms Mālik, Shāfiʿī and Ibn Ḥanbal, Suﬁyān al-Thawrī, Yahyā b. Maʿīn, ʿAlī al-Madīnī and many others have established a reputation of ‘adāla to an extent that they stand beyond questioning and challenge. Many of them have in turn spoken well of the work of others or else have impugned and denounced them as being unreliable.\(^{25}\)

The six grades of impugnment or al-jarḥ are:

1. Majhūl al-ḥāl: whose integrity is unknown, but there is nothing negative about him. As a general rule, obscurity (jahāla) is overruled when two upright individuals are known to have accepted the report of one who would otherwise be classified as majhūl al-ḥāl. The word mastūr (hidden) is occasionally employed as an equivalent.

2. Ḍaʿīf: weak, in the sense that no scholar has given him any credit and some have openly spoken against him.
3. Majhūl: unknown, obscure, no more than one person has narrated from him, and the person has little to his credit that can be said.
4. Matrūk: abandoned, mainly because someone reliable has discredited him. The abandoned person also fails to qualify the prerequisites of uprightness.
5. Muttakam bi'l-kadhīḥ: accused of lying and forgery.
6. Khadhdhāb (liar), or maddā‘ (forger).

Al-Nawawī uses a four-point scale of evaluation that implies degrees of weakness in the trustworthiness of a narrator. The first of these is layyin al-hadīth (of little weight) which does not necessarily imply that the hadith is totally rejected yet it does imply impugnment of a type that represents a blemish in uprightness (‘adāla) of the person concerned. The second expression is laysa bi-qawmiyyin (not strong by any means) which is a degree below layyin, yet hadith narrated by this type may still be considered and upheld subject to verification. This is followed by da‘if al-hadīth (weak in the narration of hadith) which is a degree below that of laysa bi-qawmiyyin, yet still not totally rejected. And lastly, the terms matrūk al-hadīth (abandoned), wāhī (careless, superficial) and kadhāḥāb (liar). When these are used in the impugnment of a narrator, his hadith is totally rejected and abandoned.²⁶

These grades were mostly followed by earlier scholars, but some degree of laxity in their application had been noted in the works of the scholars of later ages. Many have used additional expressions for, and within, each grade. Scholars preceding al-‘Asqalānī have often used different terms for grading but were generally assiduous in their assessment.²⁷

Should there be conflicting information concerning a narrator of hadith, some of which qualifies him to be reliable and the rest does not, the evidence on al-jarh takes priority over the evidence on al-ta‘dīl. But if the negative evidence only relates to an earlier part of the narrator’s life and he is subsequently known to have become upright and reliable, then his narration may be accepted. It is important to note that in situations of uncertainty such as this, greater attention will be paid to the grounds/reasons that are given for impugnment rather than validation. Although the evidence in support of al-jarḥ takes priority over that of al-taʿdil, but if the number of validators exceed those of impugners, then validation may take priority over impugnment. The safer position, as Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ points out, is still the first one, which is supported by the majority, namely that jarḥ takes priority over taʿdil.28

When a reliable person reports from another reliable person and later denies it himself or overrules what he had earlier reported, this is not exactly a form of jarḥ but the effect is similar in that two positions, one positive and the other negative have come about, and the latter therefore takes priority over the former. Forgetfulness is also not a form of jarḥ and therefore one who forgets what he has reported earlier and denies it because of forgetfulness – this does not invalidate the hadith according to the majority, except for a group of the Ḥanafīs who do consider this as a form of impugnment. The correct view here is that of the majority as instances are noted when prominent scholars have forgotten hadith, or comments on its narrator, which they had earlier rendered or confirmed.29

The ʿulamāʾ have differed as to the admissibility of impugnment and validation without any reference to the grounds thereof. Whereas some have considered specification of the grounds necessary in both validation and impugnment, others maintain this to be a requirement of validation but not of impugnment. According to yet another view, specifying the cause or ground of one’s assessment is necessary in impugnment but not in validation. The correct view is that explanation of causes is not a requirement in validation but it is of impugnment. Impugnment is thus unacceptable without a clear reference to its cause simply because people tend to differ as to what they may or may not consider to be a ground for impugnment. This view is upheld by Ibn Maʿin, Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ, and al-Nawawī among others, whereas al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī has identified it as the madḥhab of all the leading scholars of hadith. It is thus unacceptable to judge a narrator to be weak, or unreliable, without explaining the ground of his weakness.30

Ibn Ḥajar al-ʿAsqalānī has held that impugnment without explanation is unacceptable concerning a person who is considered upright by even a single learned scholar of hadith. For once a person is validated he retains that qualification unless it is set aside by clear evidence. It is generally known that the leading Imāms of hadith do not validate nor impugn a person unless they are assured of the grounds of their assessment. This is also confirmed by al-Dhahabī who went on record to say that “never have two learned scholars of ḥadith validated a weak narrator nor have they impugned a reliable one.” Abū Shahba who quoted both al-Dhahabī and Ibn Ḥajar has observed that Ibn Ḥajar’s position represents a mature stage of developments in ḥadith sciences on this.¹¹

Moreover, validation is unacceptable even from a reliable authority without naming of the person concerned. Thus if a reliable figure narrates ḥadith from “a trustworthy person (al-thiqā)” whom he does not mention by name, his validation is not acceptable, as it is possible that the same person is not considered trustworthy by someone else who might know of a ground of impugnment concerning the same anonymous “thiqā”.¹² Narration of hadith from a person by an upright narrator without mentioning that person’s name does not amount to validation (ta’dīl) either. An exception to this is made, however, concerning well-known authorities who are known to have narrated ḥadith only from reliable persons.¹³

There is a difference of opinion as to whether impugmnent and validation is acceptable from only one person or two. Those who maintain that two persons constitute the necessary minimum to establish an assessment on one side or the other do so by analogy to the testimony of witnesses. The correct view is, however, that impugmnent and validation by one person is acceptable in the narration of ḥadith, a view which has prevailed among the ‘ulamā’ of ḥadith.¹⁴

When a reliable person narrates ḥadith from someone whom he has mentioned by name, this by itself does not amount to validation of the person so named, although some have held that it does amount to validation. The correct position is, however, the first one, for it is impermissible in principle to narrate ḥadith from a person who may not pass the test of probity (‘adāla) and narration by itself does not establish his ‘adāla.¹⁵

Among the grounds of impugmnent that some scholars have listed are (1) attribution of lies and false reports to the Prophet and narrating something from him which no reliable person has verified; (2) suspicion of lying especially concerning someone who has a reputation of telling lies even if he is not specifically known to have lied concerning a hadith; (3) reputation for making frequent errors; (4) when one is known for neglect and oversight (gäfût); (5) sinful conduct whether consisting of words or action that falls short of unbelief (kufr); (6) when one is known for incredulity and imaginary indulgence (wahm) contrary to truth; (7) disagreement with reliable authorities and narrators; (8) obscurity in regard to personal identification or in regard to uprightness; (9) advocacy of pernicious innovation (bid'a) consisting of views and beliefs that are contrary to well-known precedent owing to confusion and doubt but not to hostility and arrogance; and (10) bad memory of the kind that gives rise to doubt whether the person is accurate or the opposite thereof.26

Hadith scholars are in agreement as to the permissibility of what may amount to backbiting (gäbä) in the context of impugnment. Although gäbä is normally forbidden, it is permitted on grounds of necessity in this context, for it would otherwise be difficult to distinguish the truthful from the liar and the upright from the transgressor. The same exemption from gäbä is granted, on the basis of general consensus (ijma') with regard to witnesses before the courts of justice. The purpose in both cases is to protect the community against harm and to avail them of the best means that would uncover the truth and avert indulgence in falsehood and evil.27

Validation and impugnment are only acceptable from persons who are knowledgeable of this subject to a degree that inspires confidence in their ability and insight. The person who validates or impugns narrators of hadith must be dedicated to truth and act in the capacity of a judge of high integrity. The majority of hadith scholars have held that impugnment by a learned and upright person is acceptable even without any further explanation as to its grounds, but that such explanation is necessary in the event where impugnment is attempted by a commoner (dimm). It is thus reported that when the Imam al-Shafi'i learned that someone had impugned another, he enquired into the grounds of his accusation. The man said that he saw the accused urinating in a standing position. The Imam then asked as to what did that have to do with impugnment, to which the man replied that the urine would splash onto his clothes and praying in such clothes became questionable. The Imam then asked the man whether he had actually
THE 'ulamā' of ḥadīth have designated 'īlal al-ḥadīth as a separate branch of ḥadīth studies. The discussion here is primarily concerned with the study of defects of a less than obvious type in ḥadīth, defects that often escape the naked eye in that they may be present in a ḥadīth even if the ḥadīth appears to be otherwise intact. A defect ('illa) may relate either to isnād, such as elevating a suspended ḥadīth (rafʿ al-mawqūf) or connecting a disconnected ḥadīth (ittiṣāl al-mursal), or to the subject matter (matn) such as a subtle change of a word, superfluous addition or insertion of words that do not belong to the text, known as ʿidrāj, and insertion sometimes of one ḥadīth into another (idkhāl ḥadīth fi ḥadīth), or indeed the 'illa may relate to both the text and the isnād. The defects are often related to the isnād and detecting them often begins with the verification of the manifest conditions of a saḥīh ḥadīth. A defect is often suspected when there is something odd about the isnād, which may be due to its variance with other reports or criticism it might have invoked from others. The method that the 'ulamā' have applied in order to detect the 'illa in ḥadīth is to look into all the relevant information concerning a particular ḥadīth and ascertain discrepancies therein and then to verify the reliability or otherwise of the transmitter who comes under suspicion. The defects are often such that only the expert would be likely to detect them. Al-Hākim al-Nisābūrī (321-405 AH) has stated that the focus of attention in this branch of the ḥadīth studies is not on ḥadīth which clearly falls under the rejected (mardūd) category, nor is impugnment (al-jarḥ) of concern to 'īlal (al-ḥadīth), for a rejected ḥadīth is usually set aside and abandoned. Rather, in 'ilal al-ḥadīth one often looks into the works of reliable narrators who might have themselves failed to notice the defect in the ḥadīth they have narrated. 'Ilal al-ḥadīth basically looks into the retentiveness, comprehension, and knowledge (al-ḥifz, al-fāhima, al-ma‘rifa) of the qualified narrators of ḥadīth. Because of its sensitivity and refinement, the 'ulamā‘ of ḥadīth have often considered 'ilal al-ḥadīth as the most meticulous and worthwhile of all the ḥadīth sciences, and one who masters it is often compared to a keen craftsman who can distinguish the pure from the adulterated by dint of valuable experience. To illustrate this, it is noted that when the isnād of a ḥadīth combines transmitters from different places, such as when a Madinese transmits a ḥadīth from one who resided in Kufa, this often gave rise to suspicion.

The 'ulamā‘ have spoken at length about 'ilal al-ḥadīth and some have written specialised works on the subject. The focus is often on the skill, reliability, and knowledge of the narrators, their personal details, works, contacts and teachers. The earliest known work on 'ilal al-ḥadīth is that of Yahyâ b. Ma‘in (158–233 H) bearing the title Al-Tārikh Wa‘l-'Ilal; followed by Imam Ahmad b. Hunbal’s (164–241 H), 'Ilal al-ḥadīth; Al-'Ilal by Muḥammad Ibn Ṣâ‘a al-Tirmidhi (209–279 H), and many others.

Numerous examples of defective ḥadīth have been recorded. To give one or two brief examples, it is provided in a ḥadīth, narrated by Yūnus, from al-Zuhri, from Sālim, from Ibn 'Umar from the Prophet who said: “One who captures one unit of the Friday or other prayers, has captured the whole”.

Abū Hātim al-Rāzī has stated that this ḥadīth is defective both in respect of transmission and subject matter. The correct names in the chain of transmitters (from al-Zuhri upwards) are al-Zuhri, from Abū Salama, from Abū Hurayra, from the Prophet, and also the word “Friday” in the text is superfluous. The correct rendering of the text therefore is “Whoever captures one rak‘a of (a congregational) prayer has captured (all of) it”.

The defect ('illa) of this ḥadīth has thus been located in both the subject matter and the isnād. Another example of a defective ḥadīth is as follows: Abū ‘Abd Allāh Muḥammad reported from Ahmad b. Muḥammad b. Ṣâ‘a – Abū Hudhayfah - Zuhayr b. Muhammad b. Uthman b. Sulayman - from his father who heard the Prophet, peace be on him, reciting the Surah al-Tur in the Maghrib prayer (this is contrary to normal practice of silent recitation). Al-Nisaburi has identified three defects in this hadith: firstly that 'Uthman's last name is "Ibn Abi Sulayman", and not "Uthman Ibn Sulayman", second that 'Uthman reported it "from Nafi' b. Jubayr, from his father", and third that Sulayman's father did not hear anything from the Prophet as he never saw the Prophet. Hidden defects of this kind are not infrequently found in the works of even senior scholars who often discuss a hadith without noticing the defects therein. It is always recommendable for the transmitter and critic to expose and explain any hidden defect that they know in a hadith. Al-Hakim al-Nisaburi identified ten different varieties of 'ilal, which will presently be reviewed, but has in the meantime mentioned that he only mentioned some varieties, or grounds, of 'ilal and that in reality the ways in which 'illa can find its way to a hadith cannot be exclusively enumerated nor defined. But the 'ulamâ' have not neglected the subject and most of these have, in fact, been identified and exposed from early times by scholars such as 'Abd al-Rahman b. Abi Hâtim al-Razi (d. 327 H), 'Ilal al-Hadith, and 'Ali b. Umar al-Daraquzni (d. 385), Al-'Ilal al-Warida fi'Ahadith al-Nabawiyya, and many others. The 'ulamâ' of hadith have also considered certain works such as the three collections of al-Tabarani, namely, Al-Kabir, Al-Awsat, and Al-Saghir, Daraquzni's work Al-Afird, compilations of hadith by al-Khaṭib al-Baghdâdi, and Abû Nu'aym al-Iṣfahâni's Ḥīyat al-Awliyâ' wa Tabaqât al-Asfiyâ' to contain many a weak hadith and should therefore not be relied upon.

To illustrate a defect that relates only to the text or matn, one may refer to a hadith, recorded by al-Bukhari, in which the Prophet said in response to some news that had broken out in Madina that considerable wealth had arrived from the collection of poll-tax (jizya) in Bahrain. The following day when the Prophet ended his morning prayer in congregation, the attendants had apparently expected an announcement over the distribution of those assets. The Prophet then said:
By God! I do not fear poverty for you. I only fear that when this material world has been opened to you, as was opened to those who came before you, it may distract you from the right path, just as it distracted them (fa-tulhikum kamā alathum).

In another version of the same hadith the last three words have been recorded as fa-tulhikum kamā ahlakathum (it will destroy you as it destroyed them).

It has been suggested that a Companion who might have been closer to the Prophet on that occasion had heard this phrase differently to the one standing a little farther away, as the two phrases sounded very similar and their meanings could also equally fit into the context.

For an example of an 'illa that is detected in the isnād, one may refer to a hadith narrated by Ya'la b. Ubayd al-Ṭanāfusi, from Sufyān al-Thawrī, from 'Amr b. Dīnār, from Ibn 'Umar, from the Prophet that “The buyer and seller have the option to (retract their agreement) until they part company”.

Other scholars have reported the same hadith from the associates of Sufyān al-Thawrī, including Abū Nu‘aym al-Faḍl b. Dakīn, Muḥammad b. Yūsuf al-Fāryābī and Mukhliṣ b. Yazīd. It has been discovered that Ya'la had mistakenly recorded 'Amr b. Dīnār, instead of 'Abd Allāh b. Dīnār. There is no defect in the text of the hadith.

Another example of 'illa in the isnād is the hadith narrated by Mūsā b. 'Uqba, from Suhayl b. Abī Ṣāliḥ, from his father, from Abū Hurayra that the Prophet, peace be on him, said: “One who sits in a meeting where he speaks excessively, he should say before he leaves the meeting ‘praise be to God, there is no god but Allah, I seek your pardon and I repent; if he recites this, God would grant him pardon for all of his misgivings in that meeting.” Al-Ḥākim al-Nisābūrī wrote concerning this hadith: One day Imām Muslim visited his mentor, Imām al-Bukhārī, and asked him concerning this hadith, to which the learned al-Bukhārī replied “it is an elegant hadith and it is the only one that I know of concerning this subject, except for the fact that it is defective (ma‘lūl): Mūsā b. Ismā‘il narrated it from Wuhayb, from Suhayl, from 'Awn b. 'Abd Allāh... which means that the hadith in question is a statement of 'Awn b. 'Abd Allāh and not of the Messenger of God. This is a preferable reading as it also appears that Mūsā b. 'Uqba has not actually heard it from Šuḥayl.\textsuperscript{11}

Moreover, al-Ḥākim al-Nīṣābūrī also gives the following instances of defective (\textit{ma′lūl}) ḥadiths:

a. where a \textit{mursal} (disconnected) ḥadith is partially joined by a \textit{musnad} (complete isnād) ḥadith thus ending a \textit{mursal} with a \textit{musnad}. An example of this is the ḥadith narrated by Abū Qulāba that the Prophet said: “The most compassionate of my umma is Abū Bakr, and the most stringent in God’s religion is ‘Umar; the most truly modest is ‘Uthmān; the most literate is Ubayy b. Ka‘b; and the most knowledgeable on halāl and harām is Mu‘ādh b. Jabal. Verily every umma has a trustee and the trustee of this umma is Abū ‘Ubayda (b. al-Jarrāh).”

The larger part of this ḥadith is a \textit{mursal} as it is said that Abū Qulāba may have heard it from Anas b. Mālik but this is uncertain. Only the last portion that adds something to the text concerning Abū ‘Ubayda is \textit{musnad} (as known from other reports) and it is a separate ḥadith which is joined to a larger ḥadith, thus ending a \textit{mursal} with a \textit{musnad}. The separate ḥadith here is: “Verily every umma has a trustee, and the trustee of this umma is Abū ‘Ubayda.”

b. \textit{Isnād} becomes defective, according to al-Nīṣābūrī, wherein the Madinense narrate from Kufians. The doubt here obviously relates to distance and location and doubt will persist unless it becomes known that the one link travelled to the locality of the other to meet the latter. An example of this is the ḥadith wherein the Prophet has reportedly said: “I ask God for forgiveness and repent a hundred times a day.” Al-Nīṣābūrī wrote concerning the \textit{Isnād} of this ḥadith: “It is the type of \textit{Isnād} that I would not look into, if I report a ḥadith, that is. For one who knows the conditions of authenticity of ḥadith would also know that when the Madinense narrate from Kufians, they tend to slip (zalaqū).”\textsuperscript{13}

c. \textit{Isnād} becomes defective if it omits a link which may be very well known, and the fact of its omission is known through another chain of \textit{Isnād} concerning the same ḥadith. An example of this is the ḥadith narrated by Yūnus b. Zayd, from Ibn Shīhāb (al-Zuhri), from ‘Alī b. al-Husayn, from men of the \textit{Anṣār} (\textit{ rijāl min al-Anṣār}) that one night they were with the Messenger of God “when we saw a comet that enlightened the sky.”

النبي صلى الله عليه وسلم إذا أفطر

Al-Nisābūrī wrote that notwithstanding his eminent retention and status as a reliable narrator, Yūnus b. Zayd unduly condensed the isnād of this ḥadīth. The first link in the chain of isnād was Ibn ‘Abbās who said that he had heard this ḥadīth “from men of the Anṣār”. The ḥadīth has been confirmed to be ṣaḥīḥ due to the correct information obtained concerning the missing link as it has also been reported from al-Zuhri by Ibn ‘Uyayna, Shu‘ayb, Ṣāliḥ, Azwāî and others.12

d. Isnād is defective if the narrator omits a link that may be unknown and replaces it with another name so as to make it look more reliable. An example of this is the ḥadīth reported by al-Zuhri, from Sufyān al-Thawrī, from Ḥajjāj b. Farāfis, “from Yaḥyā b. Kathir, from Abū Salama,” from Abū Hurayra that the Prophet said “A believer is dignified and generous whereas a transgressor is secretive and ignoble.”

المؤمن غلٌ كريم والفاجر خبيئٌ لئيم.

Al-Nisābūrī commented that there is a distortion in this isnād and it occurs between Ḥajjāj and Abū Salama. The correct version is verified to be “from Hajjāj b. Farāfis, from a man (‘an rajul), from Abū Salama ...”. The defective isnād has thus substituted “a man” with “Yaḥyā b. Kathīr”.15

e. Sometimes the narrator quotes his immediate source, or shaykh, who is his contemporary and the two have met, but the narrator has not actually heard the particular ḥadīth from him. An example of this is the ḥadīth narrated by Yaḥyā b. Kathīr, from Anas b. Mālik that “when the Messenger of God broke his fast in someone’s house, he would say: observers of fast opened their fast with you and ate your pure food and the angels prayed for you (or peace descended on you).”

إن النبي صلى الله عليه وسلم إذا أفطر...

(أو نزلت عليكم السكينة)
In this isnād, it is known from other relevant evidence that although Yaḥyā b. Kathīr met with Anas he did not hear this particular ḥadīth from him.\(^{16}\)

f. A ḥadīth may be considered defective due to its report via two separate chains of transmission, one of which is elevated (marfūʿ) and the other suspended (mawqūf). Thus it becomes difficult to establish whether it is a ḥadīth proper or the saying of a Companion. An example of this is the ḥadīth narrated by Abū Farwa Yāzīd b. Muḥammad, from his father, from his grandfather, from Aʿmash, from Abū Sufyān, from Jābir that the Prophet peace be on him said “One who laughs during prayer must repeat the prayer but need not take a new ablution.”

This is the elevated version of the ḥadīth wherein Jābir narrated from the Prophet. But the same ḥadīth is reported through a second isnād in which Abū ʿl-Ḥusayn ʿAlī al-Subayʿī of Kūsa narrated it from Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbd Allāh al-ʿAbsī, from Wakiʿ, from Aʿmash, from Abū Sufyān who said that “Jābir was asked concerning a person who laughs aloud in ṣalāḥ, and he said that only the ṣalāḥ may be repeated but not the ablution”.\(^{17}\)

It is quite obvious that defects of this type can easily pass unnoticed by readers who are not knowledgeable on the narrators of ḥadīth, their contemporaries and the expectation therefore of the place of particular narrators in the relevant isnād. Defect (ʿilla) is identified when something unexpected or unusual is noted concerning the isnād or the actual text of the ḥadīth.

Instances are also found of plausible additions of a phrase to an originally shorter ḥadīth, which phrase either explained the ḥadīth or gave additional detail, but was found, upon closer examination, to have been added by the narrator himself. There is a ḥadīth, for example, wherein Anas b. Mālik has stated that he had prayed in congregation behind the Prophet, as well as Abū Bakr, ʿUmar and ʿUthmān and they all used to start the prayer with the recitation of “al-ḥamdu li-llāh rabbi al-ʿālamīn and did not recite bismillāh al-raḥmān al-raḥīm”. It was later found out that the latter portion of the ḥadīth (i.e., and they did not recite ...) was not mentioned in the original version of the ḥadīth that was transmitted by Anas b. Mālik, but was added by other transmitters somewhere down the line. Al-Bukhārī and Muslim have consequently recorded the shorter version of this ḥadīth.\(^{18}\)
Hidden Defects II

Tadlis al-Ḥadith

Tadlis literally means concealment, especially in reference to a fault that a merchant does not reveal in order to sell his goods. It is the verbal noun of dalasa which originally means the mixing of light and dark colours. Tadlis is usually attempted by one who knows what he chooses not to reveal and remains silent. The ‘ulamā’ of ḥadīth have used tadlis somewhat technically in reference to a transmitter who has narrated a ḥadīth from an authority whom he met but from whom he did not learn that particular hadīth, but learned it from someone else going through the same authority. It also refers to a narrator who was a contemporary of his immediate source but has not met him, yet he makes out as if he did. At other times, the narrator, who might or might not have met with his immediate source uses a term which can imply both direct and indirect learning. In such situations, the narrator tends to avoid using such terms as “so and so informed, or spoke to me” and uses terms such as “so and so said, or it is reported from so and so”. Note for example, the ḥadīth which reads: “Abū ʿAwāna narrated (rawa Ṣuḥāib ʿAwāna) from Aḥmad, from Ibrāhīm al-Taymi, from his father, from Abū Dharr that the Prophet, peace be on him, said ...” Abū ʿAwāna then went on record to say that he asked Aḥmad whether he heard the ḥadīth in question from Ibrāhīm. To this Aḥmad answered that he actually heard it from Ḥakīm ibn Jubayr who quoted Ibrāhīm. Aḥmad had thus concealed his direct source, but the fact that he actually declared so when he was asked about it exposes the concealed element and effectively changes the Mudallas into a Mursal.¹ This form of concealment is known as tadlis al-īsnād, or hiding some weakness in the isnād, as opposed to concealment in the identification of the teachers, or tādīls al-shuyūkh, wherein the transmitter has used a scholar's name which was not commonly known, instead of using the name for which he was well known. The transmitter may have used the first name of his authority, or an appellation, or a description of some kind, which somehow fails to clearly identify his source. An example of this is the report by one Abū Bakr b. Mujāhid al-Muqrī' who narrated from “Abd Allāh b. Abī 'Abd Allāh”, by which he meant Abū Dāwūd, the author of Sunan Abū Dāwūd, but Abū Dāwūd was hardly well known by this appellation (kunya) of his. Another variety of tādīl al-shuyūkh occurs when the transmitter exaggerates in the praise of his teacher and refers to him by such terms as al-ḥāfiz al-dāhibī, al-‘allāma al-thāhibī, etc., which may be less than accurate. A similar tādīl can be seen with reference to places, such as mentioning the name of a village without mentioning the nearest city or country, or using a name that could apply to different places. An example of this is the use by al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādi of “so and so from Mā-Warā' al-Nahr reported” by which he simply meant the other side of the river Tigris. Such ambiguities have occurred occasionally in the reports of people who had not travelled widely in search of the ḥadīth, as opposed to those who had, but made out as if they had. This situation was obviously encountered frequently, so much so that Ibn Ḥajar has given it the name 'tādīls al-bilād' (concealment of cities).

The 'ulamā' have strongly condemned tādīls of the first type and have spoken disapprovingly of the second, although they have disagreed in their acceptance/rejection of ḥadīth in which tādīl might have occurred. The 'ulamā' have often equated tādīls al-isnād with lying and have disqualified the person committing it from the transmission of ḥadīth, even when committed only once. At times words and expressions that the transmitter has used are such that can equally imply direct or indirect hearing, and this creates ambiguity, but it is often read in the light of the general reputation and record of the transmitter so as to determine the reliability of his report. Reports that contain tādīls are generally suspect, yet in the more milder cases of tādīls, scholars do not disqualify the transmitter altogether and tend to accept only those of his reports in which the words used are indicative of direct hearing from the source. To give an example, one of al-Zuhri's reliable pupils, Sufyān b. 'Uayna (107-198) transmitted a ḥadīth from him saying qāla al-Zuhri (al-Zuhri reported, or al-Zuhri said), and he was asked the question, by one 'Ali b. Khashram, whether he heard that particular ḥadīth from al-Zuhri; he remained silent but Khashram repeated the question to which the reply came "No, I did not hear it from al-Zuhri, nor from the one who heard it from al-Zuhri, I heard it from 'Abd al-Razzāq, from Ma'mar, from al-Zuhri". As it is generally known, the two Sufyāns, namely Sufyān b. 'Uayna and Sufyān al-Thawrī, both well-known and reliable figures, are associated with this kind of dubious usage of words, but the 'ulamā' of ḥadīth have still accepted their reports. This is because the two Sufyāns are otherwise known to be reliable and have usually transmitted ḥadīth from trustworthy narrators; their version of tadhīs, especially that of Sufyān al-Thawrī, is often said to consist of little more than a use of appellation for the first or full name, and the ambiguity is generally ignored. This kind of tadhīs is also known in the narrations of such other personalities among the tābi‘ūn as Qatāda, Hasan al-Baṣrī and A‘mash, and even the prominent Companion, Ibn 'Abbās, for the latter had heard only a handful of aḥādīth directly from the Prophet and heard the rest from fellow Companions, and yet he often quoted the Prophet directly. But once again these are not discredited altogether as the ambiguity is considered to be slight on the whole when seen in the light of their generally acknowledged integrity and accomplishment.

The collections of both al-Bukhārī and Muslim comprise aḥādīth transmitted by these well-known figures notwithstanding their involvement in some mild forms of tadhīs. Some have compared tadhīs by Companions to Mursal ḥadīth, which should actually be classified as Mursal. Be that as it may, Subhi al-Sāliḥ is right in saying perhaps that few narrators of ḥadīth were able to avoid tadhīs altogether in all respects. The traces of tadhīs that are found in al-Bukhārī and Muslim are often said to consist of mild forms of ambiguity in the use of words and concern the precise import of expressions such as 'haddathanā' and 'akhabarānā' as to whether they might conceal the difference between direct and indirect hearing. It is probable, however, that al-Bukhārī and Muslim may have ignored such levels of uncertainty on account of the sound reputation and reliability of the persons that might have been implicated in tadhīs.
Some critics have drawn a distinction between Mudallas and the type of Mursal known as Mursal Khafi (hidden Mursal) in that the Mudallas involves transmission of hadith from someone who is known to the transmitter and the two have met or that they were contemporaries but who have not communicated concerning the hadith at issue, yet it is made out as if they had. Mursal Khafi on the other hand involves a missing link and the likelihood therefore that the two were contemporaries but have not met nor spoken to one another. Mursal Khafi differs from Mursal in that Mursal consists of a broken link at the level of the Companion and there is no concealment in it whereas Mursal Khafi consists of a noted broken link at a lower level and it is concealed. Al-Khaṭṭāb al-Baghdādi held that it is the element of concealment which distinguishes the Mudallas from Mursal Khafi. When a person transmits ḥadith from another and makes out that he heard the ḥadith directly from him and then it turns out that this was not the case, or that he intentionally conceals the name of his immediate source, this is tadlis. This is different from Mursal, which is not likely to involve concealment but it does involve omission. A Mursal, in other words, does not involve tadlis but tadlis may on the other hand involve irsāl, that is, jumping the link, or omission. This may explain why the ‘ulamā’ disapprove of tadlis much more strongly than they do of irsāl. When tadlis is committed by someone who is not known to be reliable (i.e. thiqā), it must be abandoned.4

Various reasons have been detected for tadlis, some of which are more objectionable than others. Tadlis may sometimes be due to a certain amount of confusion on the part of a transmitter who has heard many things from his immediate source and cannot distinguish with clarity exactly what he had heard, so he uses a word that is less than categorical on the fact of direct hearing and thus falls into tadlis. The transmitter may also happen to be a more senior person than his immediate source and may thus be reluctant to quote him clearly and refers to him instead by a name other than what he is commonly known by, or some such description for which he is not well known. Sometimes the transmitter, who has quoted another person on numerous other occasions, may refer to him vaguely so as to show that he has transmitted ḥadith from more than one teacher or shaykh. Tadlis may also involve an attempt to hide one particularly weak link in an otherwise reliable isnād. And lastly a certain ambiguity in taddīs may be due to a desire on the part of the transmitter to make out that he had travelled widely or met with more scholars than he actually did in his search for the ḥadīth of the Prophet.\(^5\)

The ‘ulamā’ of hadith have written at length on transmitters of hadith who have committed taddīs and their detailed investigations have led them to grade these individuals into four categories of concealers (mudallisūn) ranging from those who committed taddīs rarely but were otherwise trustworthy, to those who only left out the names and details of well-known figures, and then those who left out the names of weak and unknown links, and finally those who did this and were weak narrators themselves. As a general rule, transmission from these last two groups of people is rejected altogether, but narration of the first two grades in the four-point scale may be accepted unless there is specific evidence to suggest otherwise. There is general agreement as to the disqualification absolutely of the perpetrator of taddīs al-isnād in which a weak link is deliberately omitted. Some ‘ulamā’ have also held that the ensuing disqualification is permanent, whereas others have held that ḥadīth which is clear of taddīs may be accepted from one who has committed taddīs previously provided there is no ambiguity of any kind in his report and the person is otherwise upright. This is the view of the majority of the leading madhāhib, including the Shafi’is.\(^6\)

A branch of the hadith literature which relates closely to some aspects of taddīs is knowledge of the names of ḥadīth transmitters who are known by different names (ma’rifatu mā dhukira bi-asmā’ aw šifāt mukhtalifa). For example, Sālim Abū ‘Abd Allāh al-Madīnī, who narrated ḥadīth from Abū Hurayra, Abū Sa‘īd al-Khudrī and ‘A’isha is known by no less than eight other variations of the same basic name, including Sālim Mawla Mālik b. Aws, Sālim Abū ‘Abd Allāh al-Dawṣī, Sālim Mawla Dawṣ, Abū ‘Abd Allāh Mawla Shaddād and others. Ibn al-Jawzī has noted that this name has been rendered in fifty variations or more and this has given rise to numerous instances of taddīs.\(^7\)
THIS branch of the hadith studies, which is also known as mushkil al-hadith (the difficult in hadith) is concerned with the study of conflict in aḥādīth and proposes methods by which to reconcile them. In the event of an apparent conflict which can be resolved by recourse to interpretation (tawil), the latter is often attempted through the application of the rules of takhsīs, that is, particularisation of the general, or whenever appropriate, by qualifying the absolute (taqyid al-muṣṭaq). A conflict may also be resolved by attempting reconciliation (al-jamʿ waʿl-tamṣiq), or by providing factual information so as to distinguish the context and application of each hadith with the purpose of retaining both and applying each in their respective capacity. This area of hadith studies is also concerned with clarification of the meaning of difficult and unfamiliar terms and expressions in hadith even when there are no other conflicting hadith. This is why the expression ‘mushkil al-hadith’ is sometimes preferred to ‘mukhtalif al-hadith’ as the former can include conflict in hadith as well as hadith which is not in conflict with any other hadith but difficult nevertheless to comprehend. The difficulty in mushkil al-hadith may also be due to an apparent conflict between a hadith and a Qurʿānic text, or with human experience and natural sciences. We still retain the more commonly applied term (i.e. mukhtalif al-hadith) here with a reminder perhaps that the term ‘conflict’ is used in rather a loose sense and in reference sometimes to cases that do not strictly amount to a conflict situation. Resolving conflict and clarifying difficulties in hadith is admittedly not a facile task and the effort often involves a combination of the knowledge of fiqh and hadith. If two hadiths cannot be reconciled by recourse to the rules of interpretation, then one may be given preference over the other and in this way at least one of them will be upheld, if not both.

Mukhtalif al-hadith is concerned exclusively with valid hadith of the Sahih and Hasan varieties but not with hadith that is spurious and weak, which would not merit serious attention anyway. This branch of the hadith studies is concerned, in other words, with hadith that commands acceptance but is difficult to understand owing to conflict with other equally persuasive evidence either within or outside the hadith. Moreover, Mukhtalif al-hadith is concerned with two types of conflicting ahadith: firstly when they can be reconciled, and secondly when they cannot. The first of these may be illustrated in the two ahadith which follow:

- When the water reaches (the height of) two gullas, it does not carry dirt.⁵

إذا بلغ الاماء قلتين لم يحمل الخبث.

- God created water clean and will not make it unclean unless there is a change in its taste, colour or smell.⁶

خلق الله الماء طهورا لاينجبه إلا ما غير طعمه أو لونه أو ريحه.

There is an apparent conflict here which can be resolved by recourse to particularisation of the general. The first hadith declares water clean when it reaches a certain height (regardless of any change in its colour and taste). The second hadith declares that water is clean (below the level of two gullas) so long as there is no change in its attributes of cleanliness. Each of the two hadiths operates as a specifier over the other and the conflict therein is resolved.

The second of the two possibilities envisaged of conflicting ahadith is when they cannot be reconciled with one another, and this also occurs in one or the other of the following two varieties. (a) When it is possible to identify a chronological order between the two hadiths, in which case the rules of abrogation (naskh) will apply to them and the one will abrogate the other. Some examples of this are found in our discussion of abrogation in hadith in a separate section below.
(b) When a chronological order between the two conflicting ḥadīths cannot be ascertained, in which case recourse will be made to the rules of preference (al-tarjih) to determine which of the two is stronger and therefore preferable. There are numerous grounds of tarjih, most of which refer, in the context of ḥadīth, to the strength and reliability of its narrator, and to the clarity and strength of the wording of ḥadīth. In his Tadrīb al-Rāmī, al-Suyūṭī has discussed the grounds of tarjih under seven main headings which are then subdivided into numerous sub-varieties that reach altogether to one hundred and nine grounds on which al-tarjih may be attempted. I do not propose to discuss all of these here but will refer to some aspects thereof.

The principal grounds of preference that al-Suyūṭī has discussed are:

1. Conditions of the narrators, which refer to a variety of factors such as the knowledge of the narrators, their ages, their retentiveness, and their number (if there be many), proximity or otherwise to the source, and the manner in which the narrator received the information himself and then transmitted it to others and so forth. If one of the two conflicting hadīths is proven to be stronger on any of these grounds, it may be given preference.

2. The actual words and expressions (whether sami’tu, haddathāni, hadθatanā, etc.) and clarity of the language that the narrator has used which might indicate preferability and strength.

3. Whether the narration is verbatim or conceptual, and whether the hadīth actually refers to its own rationale and ‘illā.

4. Preference by reference to time and place – the Madīnese ḥadīth is given preference to the Makki, and the ḥadīth itself may sometimes indicate the time and place of its origin.

5. Preference by reference to the wording of the ḥadīth: the specific is preferable to the general, the literal to the metaphorical, the one that expounds its cause to the one that does not, the explicit to the implicit, the verbal (qawlat) to the actual (fi‘l), the longer text to the shorter and so forth.

6. Preference by reference to the ruling: prohibition takes preference over permissibility, and one that omits punishment or liability to the one that imposes it.
7. Preference by reference to external factors: ḥadīth which complies with the Qur'ān or other aḥādīth is preferred to the one that does not. The practice of the Companions is also a point of consideration, and so is the extraction of ḥadīth by al-Bukhārī and Muslim and so forth.

In the event where preference is totally unfeasible, then the 'ulamāʾ advise suspension (al-tawāqquf) which means that the conflict prevails and no action is taken in either direction. The four courses of action that are thus envisaged consist of (1) reconciliation and retention (al-jamʿ) whenever possible; (2) abrogation when this is ascertained; (3) preference; and (4) suspension. There is some disagreement as to whether abrogation should be the second or the last recourse, but al-ʿAsqalānī and al-Suyūṭī have opted for the order that is here presented.9

Ever since the time of the Companions, the 'ulamāʾ throughout the ages have tried to remove difficulties and conflicts in ḥadīth by recourse to interpretation and ijtihād. The scholars of ḥadīth were particularly challenged by the doubts and controversies expressed by sectarian movements, such as the Muʿtazila and the Kharijites, concerning the import and meaning of some aḥādīth. Imām Shāfiʿī (d. 204) was the first to write a book, entitled Ikhtilāf al-Hadīth, which appeared on the margin of the seventh volume of his Kitāb al-Umm. It is not an exhaustive work on the subject, but it provided a set of guidelines on methods of reconciliation and preference of conflicting ḥadīth. A more extensive work on the subject is Taʾwīl Makhtalīf al-Hadīth by Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Muslim b. Qutayba al-Daynūrī (d. 271). The author has, in this work, engaged in disputation with those who were over-critical of the Ahl al-Hadīth and sought to widen the scope of conflict in ḥadīth by highlighting spurious conflicts and aspects of conflict that were more apparent rather than real. Ibn Qutayba addressed the alleged conflicts in ḥadīth, attempted reconciliation between them, and succeeded in providing effective responses to many of the Muʿtazilite claims. Many others have written on the subject and some 'ulamāʾ have considered this branch of the hadith studies as “one of the most important, such that no learned scholar or ἀλιμ, whichever group he may belong to, can afford to neglect... It involves development of special acumen attained by scholars who are learned in hadith, fiqh and usul al-fiqh." Another authoritative work on the subject is Mushkil al-Āthār by Abū Ja'far Ahmad b. Muhammad al-Tāḥāwī (d. 321 H) in four volumes, a later edition of which was published in India in 1333 H. Abū Bakr Muhammad b. al-Ḥasan al-Īsfahānī’s (d. 406), Mushkil al-Ḥadīth wa Bayānūh is also well known.

Some of the early partisan movements such as the Kharijites, the Shi'a, the Qadariyya and the Murji’ā have quoted hadith in support of their views and doctrines often at the expense of other often divergent evidence in the hadith. When two aḥādīth are quoted by the two sides, there is often an apparent conflict which may take a great deal of explanation to reach an understanding over issues. I do not propose to engage the reader in minute details of this but will merely give the general outline of an example as follows:

The Kharijites have quoted in support of their viewpoints the following two aḥādīth:

1. A group of my umma will continue to be defenders of the truth and will not be harmed by the opposition of those who oppose them.

لاترك طائفه من أمتنا على الحق ظاهرين لأيضاهم خالف من خلفهم.

2. Put your swords on your shoulders and then let your strength be shown in your number.

ضعوا سيفكم على عواتقكم ثم أبدوا خضراهم.

The first hadith evidently envisages defence of truth through rational evidence and persuasion, whereas the second speaks of recourse to military methods.

Those who argued against this militant posture advised adherence to the community and quoted in support the following aḥādīth:

- You are to follow the community, for God Almighty's (protective) hand is with them.

عليكم بالجماعة فإن إداء الله مع الجماعة.
One who boycotts the community even by the measure of a span truly severs his bond with Islam.

The explanation to justify peaceful methods of defence or recourse to militarism and war may thus be sought in the true merit and value of the cause which is pursued. The question to ask may be whether the cause or principle for which one fights merits such a course of action in the first place.

Controversy has also arisen over the correct meaning of the hadith which Ibn Māja has recorded on the authority of Abū Sa‘īd al-Khudri, and al-Tabarānī from ‘Ubdā b. al-Ṣāmit, wherein the Prophet has said in a supplication.

O My Lord! Help me live as a pauper, let me die as a pauper, and resurrect me among the paupers.²

ٍاللهم أحيني مسكنًا وأنتي مسكنًا وأحشرني في زمرة المساكين.

This hadith is considered to be in apparent conflict with the Prophet’s frequent denunciation of poverty, and also his other supplications in which he sought refuge from God against the evils of poverty. A hadith has thus been recorded on the authority of ‘A‘ishah wherein “the Prophet, peace be on him, prayed to God against the evil of poverty (ṣinat al-faqr),” and said on another occasion that “God loves His servant who is affluent, pious, and modest.”³

These and similar other sayings of the Prophet have led some to reject his earlier quoted hadith which apparently presented a conflict situation. Al-Qarāḍāwī who has referred to many of these instances has observed, and also quoted other commentators, to the effect that the correct meaning of poverty in the first hadith is modesty and humility and not poverty in its literal sense. How can the literal meaning be upheld in the face of the Qur’ānic address wherein God Most High shows His favour to the Prophet Muhammad by saying “... and He found you poor and made you affluent” (al-Duḥā, 93:8)?
Noted here is also the ḥadīth wherein the Prophet drew a parallel between poverty of disbelief: “O Lord, I seek Thy refuge from disbelief and poverty.”

اللهم إني أعوذ بك من الكفر والفقر.

The reality of all this is reflected in the fact that the Prophet lived a lifestyle of humility and shunned arrogance and pomp that was in vogue in Persian and Roman courts of his time.

Moreover, there is a ḥadīth that Abū Dāwūd has recorded on the authority of Umm Salama which prohibits women from looking at men, but the ḥadīth has been rejected due to conflict of evidence. The ḥadīth in question provides:

Umm Salama, may God be pleased with her, said: I was with the Messenger of God when Maymūna was also present, at which time Ibn Maktūm turned up, and this was after we were ordered to practice veiling. So the Prophet told us to “hide from him”. We said, O Messenger of God! Is he not blind? He can neither see nor recognise us! Then the Prophet said “Are you blind too then? Can you not see him?”

Notwithstanding this being graded as a Ṣaḥīḥ ḥadīth, it is noted that one person in its chain of isnād, namely Nabhān the mawlā (freed slave) of Umm Salama is obscure and has been classified as among the weak (al-duʿāʾif). Besides, this ḥadīth is in conflict with the evidence recorded by both al-Bukhārī and Muslim which implies permissibility of a woman looking at a stranger.

Thus according to a ḥadīth, which al-Bukhārī has recorded: The Prophet told Fāṭima bint Qays after her divorce became final, to “observe your waiting period in the house of Ibn Umm Maktūm, for he is a blind man, you may be changing your clothes but he would not be able to see you.”

According to another ḥadīth which both al-Bukhārī and Muslim have recorded, ‘A’ishah has said that “The Prophet was screening me... with his mantle on me while I was watching the Abyssinians playing in the courtyard of the mosque."³³³ رأيت النبي يسترئي بردائه وأنا أنظر إلى الحبشة يلعبون في المسجد.

Al-Bukhārī has also placed this ḥadith under the heading "Chapter on a woman’s looking at the Ḥabash and the like of them without suspicion."¹⁴ While speaking in support of this latter position, al-Qaraḍāwī has also quoted the views of the author of Tafsīr al-Qurtubī and Qādi ʿIyāḍ al-Yaḥṣubī to the effect that it is permissible for a woman to look at a stranger or inspect what a man is doing; what is not permitted however, is when viewing takes place in a lascivious context.¹⁵

As already noted, a part of the disagreement that has arisen concerning the meaning of some aḥādīth is due to a tendency among the scholars and jurists to stick to the literal meaning of words and expressions even on occasions when a metaphorical meaning would seem preferable. There are numerous instances of departure from the literal to metaphorical meanings of words in the Qurʾān and the position is no different in the Sunna.¹⁶ Some differences of opinion have arisen on this especially with reference to the attributes of God Most High and the precise meaning of activities or references that God has occasionally recorded of His own illustrious self. Some of these difficulties, but not all, can be removed in the understanding of such expressions in the Qurʾān and the Sunna by recourse to allegorical interpretation and metaphorical readings of the relevant words and sentences. We shall give more examples of this later, but it will be noted here that disagreement concerning the meaning of ḥadith is known to have arisen between the Companions themselves. An example of this is the ḥadith (of the cat) which Imām Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal and others have recorded on the authority of ʿAlqama.

We were with ʿA‘īsha when Abū Hurayra arrived and ʿA‘īsha told him: Are you the one who reported the ḥadith that a woman was tortured concerning a cat that she had kept in captivity and refused to feed or water the cat? To this he said: "I heard it from the Prophet." Then she said: Did you know who that woman was?
The woman who did so was a disbeliever. For a believer is much too honoured by God Most High to let him be tortured for the sake of a cat. When you speak concerning the Prophet, you must be careful as to what you are saying.

Al-Qaraḍāwī has quoted this episode and noted that in her critique of Abū Hurayra, ʿĀʾisha, may God be pleased with them both, did not give due credit to Abū Hurayra’s ḥadith and her analysis of it was also somewhat questionable. “May God bless ʿĀʾisha for her neglect of something that lies at the very heart of Islam.” The punishment due to that woman was because of her callousness to let a weak animal die of hunger and thus her failure to show mercy. The principle that is upheld in the ḥadith is of utmost importance “so much so that it makes Muslims proud to subscribe to a high standard of humanitarian value, one that demands care and compassion for all animals.” Al-Qaraḍāwī went on to refer to another ḥadith which confirms the one that Abū Hurayra had narrated. According to this additional ḥadith God Most High granted forgiveness to an otherwise unruly woman for her act of compassion in giving water to a dog that was suffering from thirst.

Moreover, Abū Hurayra’s ḥadith concerning the cat has also been narrated by another Companion, ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿUmar, which both al-Bukhārī and Muslim have recorded as follows:

A woman was punished concerning a cat, which she kept in captivity until the cat died of hunger. So she was sent to Hell. God Most High said to her, you did not feed the cat nor watered her while you tied her, nor did you send her out so that she could feed herself from the east over of the earth.

عذبت امرأة في هرة، حبضتها حتى ماتت جوعا فدخلت في النار. قال الله: لا أنت أطعمتها ولا سقيتها، ولا أنت أرسلتها فأكلت من خشاش الأرض.

To further illustrate the metaphorical in ḥadith and difficulty that it may entail, we refer to a hadith, recorded by both al-Bukhārī and Muslim, on the authority of ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿUmar that the Prophet, peace be on him, said:

When the people of Paradise reside in Paradise, and those of Hell in Hell, then death is brought forward until it stands between Paradise and Hell, and then it is slaughtered. A caller will then call out: O people of Paradise! there shall be no death anymore; O people of Hell! there shall be no death anymore. The people of Paradise will exceedingly rejoice whereas the people of Hell will be saddened further.\textsuperscript{20}

It is reported in another hadith on the authority of Abū Saʿīd al-Khudrī that “death will, on the Day of Resurrection, be brought in the form of a pretty sheep ...”\textsuperscript{21}

How is the former hadith to be understood? How is death slaughtered or killed; and how does death itself, in other words, die? Some Muʿātazila commentators have underscored the difficulty here by saying that death is an attribute (ʿaraḍ) which has no physical existence or corpus (jism) and the one does not change into the other. How can an attribute be slaughtered? Others have doubted the authenticity of this hadith and sidelined it altogether, and still others have said that the reference here is to the custodian (mutawallī) of death. There is also an opinion that denounces all of this as unwarranted extrapolation that seems to question God’s unbounded power over all things. Then it is noted that all of this disagreement is caused by a refusal to read a simple metaphorical meaning in the hadith which is that God will bring death to an end.\textsuperscript{22} But even this view is questioned by Ahmad Muhammad Shākir who says that in the matter of the unseen (ghaybiyyāt) it is superfluous to resort to metaphorical interpretation; one should retain the literal meaning and leave it at that, and that nothing is beyond God’s ability and power.\textsuperscript{21}

For another example of the metaphorical we may review the following hadith:

God Most High created the creation and when He finished it, the womb rose and said: this is (or I am) the place of refuge for one who avoids severing the ties of kinship. God Most High said “Yes. Are you not pleased that I get close to one who gets close to you, and I sever ties with one who severs you?” The womb said yes, and God confirmed: It (this favour) is granted to you ...\textsuperscript{24}
Is the reference to ‘womb’ here figurative or literal? – is a question over which commentators have differed, and there is evidence to the effect that the literal meaning is not meant.

Al-Qaraḍāwī has quoted Qādi Ḥiyād and Tafsir al-Qurṭubi to this effect and has himself observed that this type of shift from the literal to metaphorical (Majāzī) meaning poses no issue, despite the somewhat more involved debate that has arisen over the place of the figurative in the Qur’ān and the Sunna. Ibn Taymiyya has gone on record to deny the occurrence of the metaphorical in the Qur’ān and ḥadīth. Al-Qaraḍāwī has referred to Ibn Taymiyya but added that what Ibn Taymiyya had meant was to close the door on the excesses of allegories in the essence and attributes of God Most High. This may be justified to some extent but not the totally negative attitude that Ibn Taymiyya has taken over the issue of the Majāzī in the Qur’ān.25

Even Ibn Ḥazm al-Ẓāhirī, whose literalist approach to the reading of the text has earned him the name ‘Ẓāhirī’, has not denied the occurrence of the metaphorical in the Qur’ān and the Sunna. Ibn Ḥazm went on to give the following two examples in support of his views: one of these is the ḥadīth which reads that “The Nile, Euphrates, Sayhūn and Jayhūn are the rivers of Paradise,” and the other where the Prophet said that “There is a garden from the gardens of Paradise between my house and my pulpit.”

Ibn Ḥazm then comments that only the ignorant would hold on to the literal meaning of these, and it should be obvious in each case that metaphorical language has been used. “Rivers from Paradise” underscore the benefit that is derived from these rivers, and “a garden from Paradise” is meant to underscore the superiority of that particular place in that praying therein rewards one with Paradise.26

Yet the ‘ulamā’ have warned against indulgence in figurative interpretations and advised that only when the literal approach fails, one may resort to the metaphorical. Instances have been noted of unwarranted departure from the literal to the metaphorical reading of hadīth, including the hadīth, for example, which instructed the believer to:
Wake up for suḥūr (pre-dawn meal in Ramadān), for there is blessing in the suḥūr.27

تَسْحَرُوا فَإِنَّ فِي السَّحْوُرِ بَرَكَةً

It is then said metaphorically that ‘suḥūr‘ in this ḥadīth means prayer and asking for forgiveness (i.e. al-istighfār) at that time rather than eating a meal as such. This is unnecessary and represents an unwarranted departure from the literal meaning as there are several other aḥādīth in support of the same.

Another and even more remote interpretation of ḥadīth may be said to be the one that some modern commentators have given concerning the references to “al-Masīḥ al-Dajjāl” who will appear before the return to earth of Jesus Christ. Muslims are advised to seek God’s protection and help against the evil (fītna) of Dajjāl. Some people have advanced the view that references to Dajjāl, in the many aḥādīth where such references are found, imply western culture and its influence, which is blind (in one eye, just like the Dajjāl!) to the idea of spirituality and religion and sees life, the universe, and man as purely physical realities.

Al-Qaraḍāwī has referred to this and has rightly observed that it is rather a forced reading of the text and should be avoided. There are a large number of aḥādīth on this subject and also on the return of Jesus Christ that bring light and peace to humanity, so much so that when put together they become Mutawātūr, and it is hardly acceptable to escape from all of this into some metaphorical interpretation that simply fails to inspire credibility.28

Two other ḥadīths that appear to be in conflict are as follows:

1. What is watered by rain is liable to one-tenth portion (in zakāh).

فيما سقت الماء العشر.

2. There is no zakāh in less than five ansuq.

The first of these is said to be concerned with produce of dry farming land and the second with produce of irrigated land. This is one way of resolving the apparent conflict, and the method here is one of interpretation (ta'wil). The other way is proposed by recourse to the rules of the general ('ammi) and the specific (khass). The more specific or khass ruling of the second hadith thus makes an exception to the general or 'ammi ruling of the first hadith. This would mean that no zakah is imposed on less than five ansug. The second hadith thus acts as a specifier over the first and both remain applicable as a result.

Al-Qaradawi has advanced the argument on the other hand, that both of the two ahadith above are in disharmony with the Qur'an. For the general proclamation of the Qur'an on the subject of zakah on agricultural produce does not make exceptions of the sort that are found in these as well as some other ahadith. The aya in question thus provides:

He it is who created gardens with trellises and without, and dates and tilth with produce of all kinds, and olives and pomegranates similar in kind and different. Eat of their fruits in their seasons, but render the dues that are proper on the day that the harvest is gathered. (al-An'am, 6:141)

This verse evidently does not differentiate between foodgrains, fruits and other agricultural produce and makes all liable to the payment of zakah. Even the hadith which provides that “there is no zakah on vegetables” — is considered to be weak.

According to al-Tirmidhi, “the isnad of this hadith is not sound and nothing reliable on this subject has been proven from the Prophet.” Al-Qaradawi who has written a voluminous work on zakah discusses this subject and questions some of the juristic conclusions, such as the one that makes only four categories of foodgrains liable to zakah, to be at odds with the Qur'an. How can one say that other fruits and vegetables as well as apple gardens, tea plantations, cotton and so much more which involve enormous amounts of produce are not liable to zakah? This very position, he adds, has led some observers to the conclusion that the Islamic taxation system only makes the small farmers who grow wheat and barley liable to tax. It is right for a Muslim,” al-Qaradāwī wrote “to stand in the way of any ḥadith which he finds to be in conflict with the clear injunction of the Qur’ān and finds no other suitable interpretation for it.”

There is also a ḥadith that appears in Abū Dāwūd, on the authority of Ibn Mas‘ūd, which states, somewhat surprisingly, concerning the pre-Islamic practice of female infanticide, that “Both the perpetrator of infanticide and its victim are in Hell.” One can understand the verdict of this hadith on the perpetrator of this heinous crime, but why is the child condemned to the same predicament? This hadith also appears to be in conflict with the Qur’ānic āya: “and when the female child buried alive is questioned: for what crime was she killed?” (al-Takwīr, 81:8–9).

The hadith at issue is therefore unreliable, and there is no suitable interpretation that can actually remove this conflict. To give another example, we refer to a hadith which both Muslim and Abū Dāwūd have recorded on the authority of Anas b. Mālik that a man asked the Prophet concerning his deceased father “where is my father?” to which the Prophet replied “your father is in Hell,” and when the man was walking away, the Prophet called him, to say to him “my father and your father are (both) in Hell.” To this we apply the same analysis that was earlier presented concerning a similar ḥadith that referred to the mother of the Prophet. The Prophet’s father ‘Abd Allāh and his mother Āmina died at a time when no message nor scripture had been communicated to the inhabitants of Arabia, which means that they were not accountable. The ḥadith verdict that condemns them to Hell therefore appears to be unsustainable and in conflict with the Qur’ān. To give yet another example of a difficult situation we refer to a hadith in which the Murji‘a have advised a peaceful and pro-status quo attitude and quoted the following hadith in support of their viewpoint:

One who utters lá ilāhu illā-Allah goes to Paradise. It was asked then: Even if he commits theft and adultery? And he (the Prophet) said: Even with theft and adultery.

من قال لا إله إلا الله فهو في الجنة، قيل: وإن زنى وإن سرق، قال: وإن زنى وإن سرق.
The opponents rejected this and quoted the following hadith to the contrary:

The adulterer does not commit adultery while he is a believer and the thief does not commit theft while he is a believer.

The explanation may be in the figurative language of the hadith in both cases – both accentuating the value of true faith. One who has it cannot commit such and such, so to speak, and God may still grant him success if he repents. The literal meaning is not intended perhaps. A certain conflict appears also to exist between the following two ahādīth one of which provides to the effect that “no contagious infection of disease nor bad omen is conveyed without God’s permission,” and another hadith which directs the believers to “run from the leper like you run from a lion.”

لا عدو ولا طيرة.

Both ahādīth are accepted and an explanation is provided in that diseases are not inherently contagious but when a healthy person mixes with one who is infected with the disease, he may catch it. Transmission of disease is thus caused by contact and intermingling, and causation remains the accepted norm of the laws of God.
Unfamiliar Expressions in Ḥadīth

Gharīb al-Ḥadīth

This branch of the Ḥadīth studies is concerned with odd and unfamiliar expressions that are encountered in Ḥadīth. When the Ḥadīth contains rare and difficult expressions, it becomes naturally difficult to understand. The ‘ulamā’ have, in fact, encountered unusual expressions in the Ḥadīth especially after the documentation of Ḥadīth on a large scale and it is said that the tābi‘i al-tābi‘ūn, that is, the third generation of Muslims, were the first to speak on the subject. Outlandish elements may be inherent in the meaning of a word or words, or it may be due to customary usage and differences in customs and dialects. A certain degree of ambiguity and confusion has also been caused by contact and literary influence from non-Arab sources, especially the Persian language and tradition after the mid-second century hijra when such influences began to affect the language and culture of the Arabian peninsula.

Noted in this context is also the nature of the Prophetic mission of Muḥammad concerning whom it is proclaimed in the Qur’ān: “We did not send you but as a conveyer of good news and warnings to the whole of mankind” (Sabā’, 34:28).

وَمَا أَرْسَلْنَا إِلَّآ أَن نُخْبِرَكُمْ بِالْغُرُورِ وَنُخْبِرَكُمْ بِبَيْنَاهُ وَكِتَابٍ

The mission of the Prophet Muḥammad was not confined to the Qurayshites of Makka; he had to address and communicate with all the tribes of Arabia. Arab tribes had different dialects some of which were easy and light whereas others were unfamiliar even to the nearby tribes and were not well-known at all. The Bedouins among the Arabs were particularly noted for the use of unfamiliar words and expressions. They used to convert, for example, the definite particle “al” to a single letter “mīm” and this often sounded unfamiliar and confusing to others. This feature of the spoken Arabic in the Arabian peninsula was also noted in regard to the text of the Qur’ān. As is well-known, the Qur’ān was compiled into a single volume during the time of the first Caliph Abū Bakr, but then it was variously rendered and pronounced in the “seven dialects of the Arabs”. These variations became a cause for concern strong enough to impress upon the third Caliph ‘Uthmān to verify the text of the Qur’ān once again and then to order the variant versions to be destroyed.

With the arrival of non-Arab people into the Arabian peninsula in large numbers following the period of the Companions and the Followers, words of non-Arabic origin infiltrated into Arabic and were absorbed into the Arabic language, some of which then sounded less than familiar to the Arab speakers themselves. The newcomers and foreigners on the other hand themselves had difficulty in mastering the language of the Qur’ān and ḥadith. Then there came a time when the ‘ulamā’ and scholars of ḥadith were prompted to address the issue of unfamiliar words and expressions which had crept into the corpus of ḥadith. For the vast bulk of ḥadith was articulated and narrated in the words and expressions of the narrators and included among them were Arabs and non-Arabs from almost every corner of the Islamic domain. The early scholars of ḥadith took a meticulous attitude toward such unfamiliar and difficult words and expressions as they encountered in the text of the ḥadith. It is thus reported that ‘Īmām Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal was once asked about the precise meaning of a letter of an unfamiliar description in a ḥadith to which he replied: “Ask those who are expert in al-gharīb, for I am reluctant to speculate concerning the sayings of the Messenger of God”.

One of the experts of Arabic language, ‘Abd al-Malik b. Qurayb al-‘Aṣma’ī (d. 216 H) was once asked about the meaning of the ḥadith which simply read “al-jārū aḥaqqu bi-saqqabihi,” to which he replied “I do not wish to interpret the ḥadith of the Messenger of God, but the Arabs tend to use ‘al-saqab’ in the sense of “immediately adjacent” (inna al-saqab al-lāziq).

The ḥadith would thus mean that “the neighbour has a greater claim to what is immediately adjoining his property.”
The first work that addressed the gharib al-hadith was that of Abū 'Ubayd Ma'āmar b. al-Muthannā al-Taymī (d. 209 H), a small book in which he explained unfamiliar expressions in ḥadīth by reference to Islamic or pre-Islamic origins of the words and how they might have been used in poetry and prose and the meaning they conveyed in the particular ḥadīth in which they occurred. Several works carrying the title Gharīb al-Ḥadīth were written, including a highly acclaimed one by Abū 'Ubayd al-Qāsim b. Sallām (d. 224) entitled Gharīb al-Ḥadīth wa'l-Āthār, and another by Muhammad b. al-Qāsim al-Anbārī (d. 328).4

Some of these works are better organised than others and deal with words and expressions in alphabetical order which makes them easier to use. Abū 'Ubayd’s work is comprehensive as it is said that it is the result of forty years of scholarship. Ibn Qutayba ad-Daymūrī (d. 276 H) subsequently wrote his work on Gharīb al-Ḥadīth in which he supplemented Abū 'Ubayd’s work and filled in what was left out of Abū 'Ubayd’s collection. One other work that acquired fame bears the title Al-Nihāya fi Gharīb al-Ḥadīth wa'l-Āthār, by Majd al-Dīn Abī'l-Sa'ādat b. al-ʿAthīr (d. 606 H). Since this was written at a much later date, it has combined and consolidated preceding works on the subject and is accepted as a work of reference on gharīb al-hadith. Many others wrote glosses and commentaries on it. Al-Suyūtī (d. 911) summarised it in his Al-Durr al-Nāthīr Talkhīṣ Nihāya Ibn al-ʿAṭīr, and there is even one which bears the title Al-Kifāya fi Naẓm al-Nihāya by Abū'l-Fīḍā’ Ismā‘īl b. Muḥammad al-Ba‘labak al-Ḥanbālī (d. 785) which has turned the Nihāya of Ibn al-ʿAṭīr into a book of poetry. Arabic words such as bāḥā’ (to take pride), abbāh (houses), labātā (to fall, also to enjoy), bughamsh (rainfall), ḥudhayyā (tidings, good news) and many more such expressions that occur in ḥadīth are unfamiliar even to native speakers of Arabic and the ‘uṣūlāli have elaborated on their precise meaning.4

There are basically two ways to explain the unfamiliar expressions in ḥadīth, one of which is to look into other ḥadīth or works of ḥadīth by different persons and on different subjects which may help to explain the problematic terms. This is the preferable of the two methods. The second method is, of course, through recourse to dictionaries, both general and specialised, as well as works on the subject of *gharīb alhadith. One of the commonly used works of reference on the subject is that of Jār Allah Maḥmūd al-Zamakhshāri, Al-Fāʻiq li-Gharīb al-Ḥadīth. Al-Ḥākim al-Nisābūrī has recounted what many ulama before him have said, that God Most High has favoured the Muslim umma with four people: with al-Shafi‘i who advanced the understanding, or fiqh, of the hadith of the Messenger of God; with Abū ʿUbayd (Qāsim b. Sallām) who explained the gharāʾib (pl. of gharīb) of the hadith; with Yaḥyā b. Maʿin who cleared the hadith of the Messenger of God from fabrication and lies; and with Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal who remained firm against adversity and hardship (mīḥna) in serving the Messenger of God, peace be on him; without their services, Islam would have dissipated. Al-Nisābūrī has also spoken in praise of similar distinguished services of ʿAli b. al-Madini and other prominent figures in the field.

Al-Nisābūrī has quoted a number of aḥādīth in which words and phrases of an unfamiliar type occur and he then attempted to explain their meaning; he also tried to verify a particular meaning as the preferred meaning of the words in question. One such hadith he quoted is in reference to a common expression of the Arabs who would say “Khabūhat nafsī” (my soul indulged in filth), and the Prophet said concerning it “Let none of you say khabūhat nafsī, but say rather laqisat nafsī.” This last word is somewhat unfamiliar and it is said to be synonymous to “dāqat nafsī” (my soul/heart suffocated) apparently in reference to a kind of pain or ailment to which it applied. Al-Nisābūrī has also quoted some words that the Prophet spoke affectionately while playing with his grandson al-Ḥusayn, which have been subsequently explained by experts in the language. Quoted also is a poem cited by ʿAli b. Abī Ṭalib which contains unfamiliar words. These too have been explained. Since these are somewhat technical, quoting them here would not serve any good purpose for English readers.
The Abrogator and Abrogated in Ḥadīth

al-Nāsikh wa’l-Mansūkh fi’l-Ḥadīth

This is an important yet little understood area of the Ḥadīth. According to al-Zuhri, even the learned jurists are often unaware of the abrogator and abrogated in Ḥadīth. Al-Shafi’i’s understanding of this subject and his contribution to it invoked compliments from subsequent scholars including the Imām Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal who went on record to say that al-Shafi’i was the one who “taught us the mujmāl and mujassar (ambiguous and clarified) and the abrogator and abrogated in the Ḥadīth of the Messenger of God, peace be on him.” Other prominent scholars who wrote on the subject include Aḥmad b. Ishāq al-Tanūkhī (d. 318/930), Muḥammad b. Bahr al-Isfahānī (d. 332/934), ʿUmar b. Shāhīn al-Baghdādī (d. 385/995) and Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. Mūsā al-Ḥamdānī (d. 584 H), who wrote Al-ʾIʿtibār fi’l-Nāsikh wa’l-Mansūkh min al-Āthār.

Abrogation is defined as the removal or suspension of one Shariʿa ruling by another, provided that the latter is of a subsequent origin and the two rulings are enacted separately from one another. The occasion for nāṣkh arises only when there is a clear conflict between two aḥādīth and the conflict between their respective rulings cannot be reconciled nor can the one be distinguished from the other in regard to its subject matter, time or circumstance. Nāṣkh occurs not only between one Ḥadīth and another but also between the rulings of the Qurʾān and those of the hadīth. Abrogation, whether in the Ḥadīth itself or between the Qurʾān and Ḥadīth, is of relevance mainly to definitive rulings especially in the area of the aḥkām, as cases of clear conflict in this area would have to be resolved prior to enforcement. Since cases of conflict and abrogation between the Qur‘an and ḥadith extend beyond the scope strictly of ḥadith, naskh in its wider sense falls within the ambit more of usūl al-fiqh than ḥadith. Naskh is a controversial subject and many of the conclusions that have been upheld on it in the works of some ‘ulamā‘ have been questioned by others. The leading schools of Islamic law are also in disagreement over the scope of naskh. Among the four leading schools, only the Shāfī‘is have attempted to narrow down the scope of naskh by holding the view that the Qur‘an and the Sunna can only abrogate themselves but that they do not abrogate one another. More recent research on the subject has on the whole shown that the scope of naskh may not be as wide as it was shown in some earlier writings on the subject.³

As already noted, naskh can occur only in the case of a clear conflict between two ahādīth. Another prerequisite of naskh is to establish a chronological order between the two ḥadīths and verify that the abrogating ḥadith is of a later origin than the one that it abrogates. The subject matter of ḥadīth must also be one that is amenable to abrogation: Naskh mainly applies to the aḥkām and even here the two rulings must be decisive and not open to interpretation. Naskh does not apply to purely rational subjects nor does it apply to factual statements that are in the nature of news and reports. To say that justice is a virtue cannot really be abrogated. Similarly one can deny a report but cannot abrogate it. These are some of the prerequisites of naskh which must be fulfilled before naskh is implemented.

There are four types of abrogation in ḥadīth. The first of these is one that is explicitly known from the saying of the Prophet himself. An example of this is the hadith of Burayda which is recorded in Muslim that the Prophet, peace be on him, said: “I had forbidden you from visiting the graves. You may now visit them.”⁴ کنت نهيكم عن زيارة القبور، إلا فزوروها.

The facts of abrogation and the two rulings, one permissive and the other prohibitive, as well as the fact that these were separately enacted are all clear in the ḥadīth itself, which is why this type of abrogation is known as explicit abrogation (al-naskh al-ṣarīḥ).

Another example of this is the hadith reported by ʿAbd Allāh that the Prophet said: “You may eat what is taken from the sea (below the surface) but do not eat that which moves about above the water.”

ما حسر عنه البحر فكل، وما وجدته طافيا فوق الماء فلا تأكله.

This hadith stands abrogated by another hadith reported by Abū Hurayra that a man asked the Prophet:

O Messenger of God! We go out in the sea and carry with us a little water; if we use that water for ablution we would not have enough for drinking. Can we make ablution by sea water? The Prophet, peace be on him, said to him: “The sea is clean, its water is clean and so is the dead of the sea.”

با رسول الله، إنا تركب البحر ونحمل معنا القليل من الماء، فإن توضأنا به عطشنا، أفنتوضأ من ماء البحر؟ فقال رسول الله صلى الله عليه وسلم: هو الطهور ماؤه حل مينته.

Second, abrogation in hadith may also be known from the saying of a Companion rather than the text of the hadith itself. An example of this is the hadith reported by Abū Ayyūb al-Anṣārī that the Prophet said: “Refresh your ablution after consuming what is changed (cooked) by fire”.

The hadith stands abrogated, however, by what the Companion Jābir b. ‘Abd Allāh has said that: The last of the two rulings that is known from the Messenger of God, peace be on him, is that ablution is not vitiated by consuming food that is changed by fire (or cooked by fire).

كان آخر الأمرين من رسول الله صلى الله عليه وسلم ترك الوضوء مما غيرت النار.

Another example of this is the hadith narrated by ‘Abd Allāh b. ‘Umar that the Prophet, peace be on him, said “The deceased is tortured by the weeping of his relatives over his death”.

This hadith stands abrogated, however, by what the Prophet’s widow, ‘A‘isha, is reported to have said: “May God bless Abū ‘Abd al-Rahmān (i.e. Ibn ‘Umar) who has not lied but has forgotten or mistaken that when the Messenger of God passed by a (deceased) Jewish woman whose relatives were crying over her, he said: They are crying while she is being tortured in her grave” (stating thus two separate things, i.e. not that the one had caused the other).

Third, abrogation in ḥadith may also be known through an historical or chronological sequence of events. An example of this is the ḥadith that Shaddād b. Aws narrated from the Prophet to the effect that “cupping breaks the fast of both the cupper and the cupped”; and another ḥadith reported by Ibn ʿAbbās that “The Prophet, peace be on him, cupped while he was fasting”. The former ḥadith is recorded by Abū Dāwūd and al-Nasāʿī and the latter by al-Bukhārī and Muslim.⁸

٢٠٠ أقصر الحاجم والمحجوم.

Imām Shāfiʿī has explained that the second ḥadith has abrogated the first. This is because the first ḥadith is known to have been uttered at the time of the conquest of Makka in the year 8 Hijra whereas the second was pronounced later in the Farewell Pilgrimage in the year 10. The ṣulamā’ are consequently in agreement on the conclusion that cupping does not vitiate the fast.⁹

And lastly, abrogation in ḥadith may be known through general consensus (ijmāʿ) such as the ḥadith “one who drinks liquor shall be lashed, but if he repeated it four times, he shall be killed”.

This ḥadith is recorded by Abū Dāwūd and al-Tirmidhī, but it stands abrogated as consensus has made known that action is not taken on it, and it is abrogated. Ibn Ḥazm al-Ẓāhirī has taken an exception here but al-Nawawī wrote concerning it that “the Zāhirīyya disagreement does not detract anything from the said ijmāʿ. In addition, it is known that after pronouncing the ḥadith in question, there was an occasion when the Prophet punished a man for drinking on a fourth occasion by beating but did not kill him.⁹⁰ Although ijmāʿ itself cannot abrogate ḥadith it can nevertheless verify whether abrogation has or has not occurred.¹¹
An area of the ḥadith literature which is especially helpful and relevant to the occurrence or otherwise of abrogation in ḥadith is the asbāb wurūd al-ḥadīth, that is, the phenomenology of ḥadith which explain and specify occasions of the occurrence, or pronouncement of ḥadith. One useful work on this subject is that of the Damascene Traditionist Ibrāhīm Muḥammad b. Kamāl al-Dīn, also known as Ibn Ḥamza al-Ḥusaynī’s (d. 1120 H), Al-Bayān wa’l-Tā’īf fī Ashāb Wurūd al-Ḥadīth al-Sharīf, which is alphabetically arranged in reference to persons and events. A Syrian edition of this work was published in Aleppo in 1329 H and it appears in two volumes. Many works have also been written on abrogation generally and on abrogation in ḥadith in particular. An early work on the latter was Nāsikh al-Ḥadīth wa Mansūkhuh authored by al-Ḥāfiz Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. al-Athram (d. 261) who was a friend of the renowned Ima’m Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal. The work was written in three small booklets and it has survived. Another monographic work on the subject that bore the same title was Nāsikh al-Ḥadīth wa Mansūkhuh authored by al-Ḥāfiz Abī Ḥafṣ ʿUmar b. Aḥmad al-Baghdādī, known as Ibn Shāhīn (d. 385 H). A more comprehensive work was later written by al-Ḥāfiz Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. Mūsā al-Ḥāzimi (d. 584) entitled Al-Iʿtībār fī’l-Nāsikh wa’l-Mansūkh min al-Āthār.
Additional Segments to Ḥadīth by Reliable Narrators

Ziyādāt al-Thiqāt

TWO different versions of a ḥadīth are sometimes reported by two different but reliable narrators, or even by the same narrator at different points of time, one of which adds a segment to the shorter version or records some kind of variation to the words. The question then arises as to the admissibility or otherwise of the additional data to the ḥadīth in question. The additional part is more often than not reported by one narrator who is reliable and also knowledgeable on the subject.

Two situations are envisaged here, one of which is that the additional part to a ḥadīth either opposes the substance of the shorter version and stands in conflict with it or that it merely reiterates and endorses it. There is basically no problem when the additional information confirms totally the existing part, but there are often cases where the additional segment, although confirming the shorter version, nevertheless, contains a juristic addition or an element which may present a minor interference of some kind.

In the event where the additional part conflicts directly with the existing portion of the ḥadīth, the issue will be treated as one of conflict and preference (al-ṭaʿāruḍ waʾl-tarjīh) to which the rules that apply to this subject will apply. This would necessitate looking into the circumstances and occasions of the two reports, the cause, if any, of the addition, and retentiveness of the narrators involved. If the addition is by a narrator or narrators who command a greater degree of reliability and are known for their care and accuracy in transmission compared to those who are associated with the shorter hadîth, then the longer version will be upheld and the shorter version will be treated as a shâdîh (stray) hadîth. If on the other hand, the additional elements, whether in the text of the hadîth or in its chain of transmission, are manifestly odd and isolated and are not supported by the much larger number of reported cases of the same hadîth, then the addition itself will be struck out and ignored. Attention will also be due to the occasion or circumstances in which the two versions originated. Were the two ahâdîth uttered at one and the same meeting or occasion when the Prophet actually pronounced them or on different occasions? If the latter be the case, then a conflict may be less likely to arise and both versions may be accepted as they are. But if it is established that the different versions originated at one and the same meeting or occasion, then the version that is transmitted by more narrators will prevail over that which is variably transmitted by one, provided that the former are not known for error and oversight. Consequently the additional part of the hadîth which is transmitted by a single narrator is isolated and rejected for the simple reason that error by one person is more likely than by a multitude. But if the single narrator who has reported the addition is an eminently reliable person, who is also more knowledgeable on the subject, then his version, as noted above, will be preferred over the variant report of many who are known for careless reporting, although some hadîth scholars do not agree with this. However, on occasions, the preference of one over the other version may be determined on juridical grounds and the greater proximity that might be exhibited by one or the other with the Qur’ân and the relevant principles of Shari’a.¹

As for the situation where the longer version of the same hadîth confirms and reiterates the shorter version, two possibilities can arise, one of which is where both versions are reported by the same narrator who has merely quoted the same hadîth but has elaborated it further on the subsequent occasion by adding something to it. This situation does not present a problem and the longer version is merely regarded as an elaboration and does not affect the original hadîth. But if the longer version of the hadîth adds a new point that does not exist in the shorter hadîth, then the longer hadîth is considered as a separate hadîth that is reported by a reliable narrator, and each part may be separately quoted. When the two parts of a hadîth are concerned with two different subjects, it is also permissible to quote only the relevant part in a context where the other part is left out. This also applies to a hadith that may consist of more than two subjects or points. A different scenario obtains, however, in the event where the same narrator is known to have cited the longer version of his hadith first and then a shorter version on a subsequent occasion. The longer version is to be upheld as it is likely that he summarised it later with the assurance that he has already delivered the fuller version of the hadith.

An example of hadith wherein the additional segment adds something which is however not in conflict with its shorter version is the one reported by Muslim through Abū Mālik al-Ashja’ī, from Rub‘i, from Ḥudhayfa that the Prophet, peace be on him, said "... the earth has all of it been made into a mosque for us, and its soil has been purified for us."

وجعلت لنا الأرض كلها مسجدا وتربيتها طهوراً

Abū Mālik b. Tāriq al-Ashja’ī is the only one who has narrated this hadith with the additional elements at the end, especially the reference to the soil “turbatuha” which is absent in other reports. For other narrators including ʿUbayd Allah b. ʿUmar and Ayyūb who have reported it from Nāfi’, from Ibn ʿUmar have reported the same hadith without this additional element and reported it simply as “and the earth has been made into a mosque for us and purified.”

As it appears here the additional version does not oppose the shorter version of the hadith; both are therefore accepted and this is what Imām Mālik and Abū Ḥanīfa have also held, and it is the correct position. The Shāfī’is and Ḥanbalīs have held on the other hand that the additional element brings in an adjective (wasf) which tends to introduce a change and the rules of tarjīḥ or preference would therefore apply. The Ḥanafīs and Mālikis maintain that addition of the word “turbatuha” (its soil, or dust) merely confirms that the hadith refers to the earth “al-ʿard”, whereas Imām Shāfī’ī and Ibn Ḥanbal read into this addition that it is the soil of the earth rather than all of the rest of the earth such as stones, trees and the like that is the focus of hadith. Thus it would include 'soil' that is carried to a different surface, for example, Dry ablution, or tayammum, according to the Shāfī’is and Ḥanbalīs is thus valid only with clean soil. But if the shorter version of the ḥadīth is followed, tayammum would be valid on all clean surfaces of the earth.⁴

Another example to note here is the ḥadīth, recorded by both al-
Bukhārī and Muslim from ‘Abd Allāh b. Mas‘ūd, which is as follows:

Abū ‘Amr ‘Uthmān b. ‘Aḥmad b. al-Samīmī reported from Ḥasan b.
Mukarram from ‘Uthmān b. ‘Umar from Mālik b. Mīghwāl from al-Walīd b. al-‘Ayzār, from Abū ‘Amr al-Shaybānī from ‘Abd Allāh b. Mas‘ūd who said that “I asked the Prophet, peace be on him: what is the best of all deeds? And he said “prayer when performed at the beginning of its time segment.” Then I asked “then what?” and the Prophet, peace be on him, said “struggle in the way of God”; then I said “what else?” to which the Prophet replied “being good to one’s parents”.

الصلاة في أول وقتها قلت: ثم أي قال الجهاد في سبيل الله.
قلت: ثم أي قال: بر الوالدين.

Al-Ḥākim al-Nisābūrī who recorded this hadith wrote that this is a well-preserved ḥadīth which a group of leading figures have reported from Mālik b. Mīghwāl and also from ‘Uthmān b. ‘Umar, but they do not mention the phrase “at the beginning of its time segment”. It is only Ḥasan b. Mukarram (and Bīnār b. Bashshār), both of whom are trustworthy and knowledgeable (thiqāt, faqīhān) who have reported it with the added elements. Since the additional segment does not interfere with the substance of the ḥadīth, it is accepted.⁵

In another illustration that also appears in Al-Ḥākim al-Nisābūrī’s chapter on ziyādāt, Abū ‘Ali al-Haṭīf narrated from Iṣḥāq b. ‘Aḥmad, from Abū Yūsuf Muḥammad b. ‘Aḥmad al-Hajjāj, from ‘Īsā b. Yūnus from Ibn Jurayj from Sulaymān b. Mūsā, from al-Zuhārī from ‘Urwa from ‘A’isha, that the Prophet, peace be on him, said: “when a woman is married without the permission of her guardian (wallī) and two upright witnesses, her marriage is null and void; if the marriage is consummated, she is entitled to the dower, and if there is a dispute, then the ruler is the wallī of one who has no wallī.”

ابنَ إِنْ وَلِيَّةُ وَشَاهِدٌ عَدَلَ فَنَفَكَحَا بَاطِلَ، فَإِنْ دَخَلَ بِهَا فَلَها المَهْرُ وَإِنْ اشْتَجَرْوَا فَالسَّلَاطُنُ وَلَيْ مِنْ
Al-Nisaburi then wrote that this is a well-preserved (mahfuq) hadith from Ibn Jurayj, from Sulayman b. Musa al-Ashdaq from al-Zuhri, but the phrase “and two upright witnesses” is not reported by anyone else except by Abu ‘Ali al-Haïzi. It is thus implied that the version of hadith without this additional phrase is the verified and correct version.

Additional (ziyada) can also occur in the isnad of a hadith and the nature of the scrutiny that is involved here is similar to one that is noted of addition to the text. Credibility is thus given to that version which is narrated by a larger number of narrators, and the other version is consequently considered odd or isolated. An example of this is the hadith, recorded by Muslim, which ‘Abd Allâh b. al-Mubârak has narrated from Sufyân, from ‘Abd al-Rahmân b. Yazîd b. Jâbir, from Busr b. ‘Ubayd Allah, from Abû Idrîs, from Abû Wâthila b. al-Asqa’ from Abû Murthâd al-Ghanawî, that “I heard the Prophet, peace be on him, saying: “Do not sit by the graves nor perform prayers toward them.”

Ibn al-‘Sâlîh wrote that the reference to Sufyân in the isnad of this hadith is an addition which is a mistake, and so is the reference to Abû Idrîs. As for the former, it appears that a number of reliable narrators have quoted this hadith from ‘Abd al-Rahmân b. Yazîd b. Jâbir directly and some of them have reported it in words that imply direct contact. As for the reference to Abû Idrîs, it also appears that the same group of reliable narrators who reported it from Ibn Jâbir made no mention of Abû Idrîs coming in between Busr and Wâthila, but reported it such that Busr had received it directly from Wâthila in words that implied direct hearing. Having said this, Ibn al-‘Sâlîh then quotes Abû Hâtim al-Râzî to the same effect, namely that Ibn al-Mubârak has imagined these additional names in the isnad, and his addition is therefore isolated and considered incorrect.

Additions and discrepancies that are observed in the isnad, might amount to the same hadith having been reported as a Mursal by a group of narrators whereas only one narrator has rendered is as a Musnad, that is hadith with an unbroken isnad. Discrepancies in the isnad are, broadly speaking, determined by reference to the same methods. which apply to discrepancies in the text. The rules of validation and impugnment (al-jarḥ wa'l-taʿdil) and those which apply to the veracity and retentiveness of the narrators would thus be applicable.

Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī (d. 463 H) has authored a book on the subject of additions to hadith bearing the title Kitāb al-Tamyīz al-Maẓād fir ṭuttaṣil al-Asānīd (Book on distinguishing the additions to connected chains of transmission) in which he has identified many isnāds of this kind. But Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ who has also mentioned this work has expressed reservations about some of its conclusions. It is thus said that certain isnāds which should have been identified as Mursal have not been so identified and references to such hadith therefore remained inconclusive. Similarly when there is evidence to show that direct hearing occurred between the two links in the isnād, but this has not been clearly and consistently stated as such.

In his larger work, Al-Kifāya fir Ḥlm al-Rimāya, al-Baghdādī has quoted several prominent figures including ʿAbd Allāh b. al-Mubārak (d. 181) and Yahyā b. Maʿīn (d. 233) who have recommended that in the event of doubt as to the accuracy of a longer or a shorter version of ḥadith, one should opt for the shorter version as this would also reduce the possibility of error and doubt in rendering the hadith. This is then supported by the purport of a ḥadith which al-Baghdādī and others have quoted. It is thus reported that the Prophet said in his Farewell pilgrimage: “May God gladden one who heard my speech and did not add anything to it and conveyed it to others. May the conveyer then deliver it to one who is even more attentive in preserving it.”

Some ḥadith scholars have held it permissible to shorten a ḥadith which the narrator has narrated in full on a previous occasion but then condensed it or recapitulated its purpose and meaning at a reduced length. Having quoted these various views, al-Baghdādī then observes that it is not permissible to reduce a ḥadith or omit a part of it if by doing so one is likely to truncate the ḥadith or leave out a ruling, condition or provision therein that would undermine the integrity of the ḥadith, especially when it is concerned with religious observances and ṣibādāt. When such is the case it becomes obligatory to quote the hadith in full, without any omission or change whatsoever. But if the hadith contains two separate parts one of which is not dependent on the other, nor is it a condition nor exception thereto, then it is permissible for the narrator to cite only the part that is relevant to his purpose. When this is the case, the other portion of the hadith would to all intents and purposes be treated as a separate hadith. Once the complete version of hadith is verified, it becomes permissible to summarise it for purposes of brevity. In fact it is reported that Sufyān al-Thawrī (d. 161) used to do this and summarised a hadith which he knew had already been narrated in its entirety. But he did so in such a manner that stayed clear of alteration in the purpose and meaning of hadith. As for addition of elements to hadith by a reliable narrator, al-Baghdādi wrote categorically that it is acceptable regardless of the nature of its subject matter, be it concerned with legal rulings (aḥkām) or outside this sphere, provided that the narrator is “upright, retentive, careful and accurate,” and that there is general agreement among hadith scholars on this. It is perfectly understandable, al-Baghdādi added, that two or three persons have heard the same hadith and at the point of reporting, two of them forgot a certain point in the hadith, which the third listener, who happened to be more attentive, remembered and reported it with the added elements. It is also possible that of the three persons, two suffered loss of concentration due to the late hour or fatigue and the like, and only one of them heard the complete version; then it is also possible that the other two have missed out on a word or a phrase in the same hadith. Some hadith transmitters who are reliable have actually gone on record to say that “I heard and retained what the rest of us did not,” in which case their version of the report is admissible subject to verification. It is also possible, al-Baghdādi added, that the one and the same narrator had narrated a hadith once and then remembered about a word or phrase that he forgot in his earlier report, which he then added on a subsequent occasion, when he had time to refresh his memory on relevant details.
THE grading of hadith transmitters, as noted in the previous section on impugnment and validation, enabled the 'ulamā' to classify the hadith, from the viewpoint of acceptability or otherwise, into the three broad categories of 'Sahih (sound), Hasan (fair) and Da'if (weak). It may be noted at the outset, however, that these categories are less than exclusive and sometimes tend to be overlapping in that a particular hadith may qualify for some of the conditions of 'Sahih and some also of Hasan, which is why some scholars have actually introduced intervening categories of hadith so that the name reflects the overlapping character of the ahadith that fall in between these classifications.

Hadith is classified as 'Sahih when its narrators belong to the first three classes of narrators. It is defined as a hadith with a continuous isnād all the way back to the Prophet, or a Companion, consisting of upright persons who also possess retentive memories and whose narration is not outlandish (shādhdh) while it is, in the meantime, free of both obvious and subtle defects ('ilal). The last two requirements here are concerned mainly with the text (matn) and what it all means is that both the isnād and matn of the hadith are clear of apparent uncertainty and doubt. A 'Sahih hadith must not be outlandish in the sense that it does not contradict a reliable hadith that is reported by a larger number of transmitters, or even by one transmitter of higher authority and ranking. Abū Muhammad Ḥusayn al-Baghawī (d. 516 H) has suggested a more simplified method of identifying 'Sahih and Hasan ahadith. It is thus stated that a hadith is 'Sahih if it is recorded by both al-Bukhārī and Muslim or by one of them, and it is Hasan if it is recorded by Abū Dāwūd, al-Tirmidhī and others. It is further suggested that the best of Ṣaḥīḥ al-ḥadīth are those that are transmitted by the people of Madīna. ² Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī was the first collection of ḥadīth that was exclusively devoted to Ṣaḥīḥ ḥadīth. Imām Mālik’s Mumaṭṭa’, although earlier in time, is not given the same ranking as it contains Mursal and Maqūf.³ Imām Mālik has also mixed the sayings of Companions with ḥadīth and does not therefore clearly distinguish between the Marṣū and Maqūf, whereas al-Bukhārī has distinguished and isolated the sayings of Companions and Successors and records only Marṣū ḥadīth under the Ṣaḥīḥ category. As for Imām Shafī’ī’s comment who said “I do not know of any book of knowledge greater in merit than the book of Mālik” — Ibn al-Ṣaλāḥ wrote that this was said before al-Bukhārī and Muslim came into being.⁴

Ṣaḥīḥ is also not a monolithic category of ḥadīth as it has been divided into several sub-varieties. There are Ṣaḥīḥ on which there is general agreement (muttafaq ʿalayhi) and Ṣaḥīḥ on which there is disagreement as to whether they should be classified as such. One of the well-known classifications of Ṣaḥīḥ, as already noted, is focused on al-Bukhārī and Muslim. The most authoritative of all Ṣaḥīḥ is that which are recorded by both al-Bukhārī and Muslim, followed by those which are recorded by al-Bukhārī, or by Muslim, alone, then ḥadīth which fulfil all of their conditions even if they do not appear in either. This is followed by Ṣaḥīḥ which fulfils the conditions respectively of either al-Bukhārī, or of Muslim but which, however, do not appear in either. The last of these seven varieties is Ṣaḥīḥ that is authenticated by other prominent ʿulamā’, independently, that is, of al-Bukhārī and Muslim. Geography is also a factor that is considered in determining the relative strength of Ṣaḥīḥ: Ṣaḥīḥ that originates in Madīna generally ranks highest, then comes Baṣra, then al-Shām (Syria) and then Kūfah.⁵

Ṣaḥīḥ has been further sub-divided into Ṣaḥīḥ li-dhātiḥ, that is Ṣaḥīḥ in itself, and Ṣaḥīḥ li-ghayriḥ, or Ṣaḥīḥ because of some extraneous evidence. The former is a ḥadīth which fulfils all the requirements of Ṣaḥīḥ in that it has an unbroken chain of transmitters all of whom are reliable and retentive (dābiṭūn) and it is clear of hidden defects and outlandish content. Ṣaḥīḥ li-ghayriḥ also fulfils these requirements, except for one, which is that not all of its transmitters are known for retentiveness as occasional errors have been detected in some of their reports. It is then possible that the point of weakness on account of retentiveness of the narrator is made up for by some other evidence that may fall under one or the other of the following three types:

First, when the same hadith is reported by another chain of transmitters wherein all the transmitters are fully qualified. An example of this is the hadith transmitted by Muhammad b. 'Amr from Abu Salama from Abu Hurayra from the Prophet, peace be on him, who said: “Had it not been for fear of imposing hardship on my umma, I would have ordered them to brush their teeth before every (obligatory) prayer.”

Muhammad b. 'Amr b. Alqama is well-known for truth and piety but not for retentiveness, according to some commentators, whereas others have approved of him in every respect. The above hadith thus fails to qualify as Sahih in itself and may have been qualified as Hasan, had it not been for the fact that it has also been reported by Muhammad b. 'Amr's teacher, and the latter's teacher consisting of al-Araj, Sa'id al-Muqbir, al-Muqbir's father from Abu Hurayra. It is on this basis that al-Tirmidhi has recorded this as a Sahih as he has also found an additional isnad for it through another Companion, namely Zayd b. Khalid and the various chains of isnad thus reinforce one another.5

Second, when the hadith in question is generally accepted by the 'ulama', which would, in turn, make up for the point of weakness in the transmission and it is elevated to Sahih (li-ghayrih). This is because the 'ulama' have known of the point of weakness in its transmission, on account of some compromise on retentiveness, but have nevertheless accepted it. An example of this is the hadith which proclaims concerning the open sea that “Its water is clean and so is its (unslaughtered) corpse.”

Notwithstanding some weakness in the isnad of this hadith, al-Bukhari has qualified it as Sahih, and so has al-Tirmidhi. Ibn 'Abd al-Barr has also commented in Al-Istidhkar that the 'ulama' of hadith have accepted this as a Sahih hadith.
Third, when the hadith in question is in harmony with the Qurʾān or a principle of Shariʿa, in which case it is elevated to the rank of Sahih. This is because the Sunna generally supplements the Qurʾān and the hadith in question would fit in with the general pattern of the relationship of the Sunna with the Qurʾān.

The Sahih collections signify a later stage in the compilation of hadith. In its early stages, the hadith compilers simply collected hadith of the Prophet without drawing a clear distinction between the Sahih and other ahadith, and it was the Imam of hadith, Ismāʿīl al-Bukhārī (194-256 H) who devoted his renowned collection to the compilation entirely of Sahih hadith. Of the six well-known collections of hadith, known as al-Ṣīḥah al-Sittah, only the first two, that is, Sahih al-Bukhārī and Sahih Muslim, are, in principle, devoted to the compilation only of Sahih hadith whereas the other four collections are not confined to Sahih and also contain the Ḥasan and Daʿīf varieties.

Hadith experts have identified the most reliable chain of transmission (asāḥih al-asānid) on the basis of their own understanding and ijtihād, which is why they tend to differ in their assessments. Al-Hākim al-Nisābūrī thus wrote that it is therefore not possible to say that the best isnād is from certain individuals among the Companions, or that which may be related by people from a certain town or a certain group of narrators. The Companions have transmitted hadith which are quoted and passed on by certain individuals among the Successors, most of whom are trustworthy and it is difficult to be certain in giving absolute preference to some over the others. But the hadith scholars have attempted nevertheless to mention what they considered to be the most reliable of all isnād. Ibn al-Ṣalāh agreed with al-Nisābūrī and goes on to quote examples of discrepancies in such assessments.

Ishaq b. Rāhawayh and Ahmad b. Ḥanbal are quoted to have said that the most reliable of all isnād is al-Zuhārī from ʿAlī b. al-Husayn from his father al-Husayn from ʿAlī b. Abī Taʿlīb. Yahyā b. Maʿin considered the best of all isnāds to be Sulaymān al-ʿAmash from Ibrāhīm b. Yazīd al-Nakhaʿī, from ʿAlqama b. Qays from ʿAbd Allāh b. Masʿūd. Al-Bukhārī himself considered the best isnād to be Mālik from Nāfiʿ, from ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿUmar. ʿAbū Mansūr ʿAbd al-Qāhir al-Tamīmī also went on record to say that the best of all isnād is Shafiʿī, from Mālik, from Nāfiʿ from Ibn ʿUmar. ʿAlī b. al-Madīnī and ʿAmr
b. 'Ali al-Fallās considered the best isnād to be that of 'Abd Allāh b. Ibn 'Awn from Muḥammad b. Sīrīn from 'Ābīda al-Salmānī from 'Ali b. Abī Ṭālib.

Ḥadith scholars have generally held that no one more reliable than al-Shāfiʽī has ever narrated ḥadith from Imām Mālik, and many of the 'ulamā' of later generations (muta'akhkhirūn) have considered as a "golden chain - sīsilat al-dhahab," narration by Āḥmad b. Ḥanbal from al-Shāfiʽī from Mālik - Nāfi' - 'Abd Allāh b. 'Umar. Yet there is only one ḥadith with this isnād in the Musnad of Āḥmad b. Ḥanbal, despite its voluminous content; but it is said that the ḥadith in question actually consists of four aḥādīth, which the Imām has brought together under one isnād.

Hasan hadīth is defined as a hadīth that falls between the Šahīh and Da'īf, and although its narrators are known for truthfulness, they have not attained the highest degree of reliability and prominence. When the transmitters of hadīth have, in other words, reached the highest degree of reliability on grounds of 'adāla, accuracy and retentiveness, the hadīth is ranked as Šahīh. Should there be any point of weakness in the records of the transmitters, especially with reference to retention (al-dabt) and accuracy, the hadīth is likely to be classified as Hasan. The transmitter of Hasan, in other words, qualifies as 'adl and the hadīth is clear of hidden defect ('illa) and outlandish content (shudhhudh), but there is some doubt on grounds of accuracy and dabt. The dabt of a transmitter is usually tested and evaluated by comparing the reports of a particular transmitter with similar reports by other more reliable transmitters. When there is substantial correspondence, the dabt of the transmitter under review is established, but if there is wide discrepancy in the accuracy of his reports the person is likely to fail the test of accuracy on the ground of dabt. Retention (dabt) is also of two kinds, one of which is retention by memory (dabt al-ṣadr) and the other through documentation (dabt al-kitāb). Both of them are valid and dabt through accurate documentation may under the present circumstances be said to be the principal form of dabt. This is because the volume and scope of hadīth have grown so much that dabt without documentation has almost become unfeasible. Abū ʻIsā al-Tirmīchī, the author of Sunan al-Tirmīdhī, is said to have introduced this intermediate category of Hasan for the first time, as no one else seems to have used it before then. A Ḥasan hadith may be elevated to the level of Ṣaḥīḥ if it is endorsed by another Ḥadīth with a stronger isnād, in which case it would be called Ḥasan li-ghayrīḥ, that is, Ḥasan because of that (extraneous) evidence. This is in contradistinction to Ḥasan li-dhātiḥ, which is Ḥasan for its own sake. As noted above, this dual classification of li-dhātiḥ and li-ghayrīḥ also obtains on similar grounds for Ṣaḥīḥ and Daʿīf.

Ḥasan is an intermediate category between Ṣaḥīḥ and Daʿīf and it seems that most of the ‘ulamāʿ of ḥadīth did not even recognise it as a separate category for some time. It seems that until it was generally recognised as a separate category, Ḥasan was generally subsumed under Ṣaḥīḥ. This is implied in the nomenclature of al-Tirmidhi’s book as al-Jāmiʿ al-Ṣaḥīḥ despite the fact that it contained Ḥasan ḥadīth which the author himself had acknowledged. In earlier times, inconsistency of terms existed even with regard to Ṣaḥīḥ which writers and ḥadīth scholars have variously identified as al-jāyyid (very good), al-qamī (strong), al-thābit (well-established, proven). The Imāms al-Shāfīʿī, Ahmad b. Hanbal and al-Tirmidhi sometimes even used phrases such as ḥasan jāyyid, ajmaid al-asāmīd and the like.9

A Daʿīf ḥadīth is generally defined as one which fails to qualify the conditions of Ṣaḥīḥ and Ḥasan. More specifically a ḥadīth is classified weak or Daʿīf if its narrators include a person or persons of lower grades than those accepted for Ḥasan on a scale of gradation that appears in our discussion of al-jārī ṭaʿlīl in chapter eight above. The weakness in Daʿīf may be in the isnād or in the text (matn) or in both. There are many varieties of Daʿīf; Mursal is one of them, and it is ḥadīth with a broken link in its isnād at the level of a Companion. A Follower (tābiʿī) has, in other words, reported it directly from the Prophet. The leading Imāms, Abū Ḥanifa, Mālik and Shāfīʿī, have accepted the Mursal, not only of the Companion, in which one Companion might have reported a ḥadīth from a fellow Companion and not directly from the Prophet, but also of prominent scholars of the tābiʿīn such as Saʿīd b. al-Musayyib, Qatāda, and al-Zuhri. Imām Shāfīʿī has also accepted Mursal if it was supported by another hadīth with an unbroken isnād, or when it was in harmony with the precedent of the Companions and also when the ‘ulamāʿ generally accepted it. The Hanafs, who accept Mursal of the first three generations, have justified their stance by saying that when an upright and learned person is convinced about the truth and reliability of a ḥadith, he tends to link it directly to the Prophet, saying that the Prophet said such and such. Imām Ahmad Ibn Ḥanbal does not rely on Mursal and the majority of ʿulamāʾ of hadith and jurisprudence are of the view that acting upon the Mursal is not obligatory. Both al-Bukhārī and Muslim, however, contain the Mursal of Companions. It is noted, for instance, that much of the ḥadith narrated by Ibn ʿAbbās falls under this category, due mainly to his young age: he was only thirteen at the time of the Prophet’s demise, and has evidently narrated hadith which he had subsequently learned from fellow Companions.

The ʿulamāʾ have generally accepted Mursal of the Companions, which is somewhat different from Mursal proper, since the latter involves direct report by a Follower or tābiʿī. In Mursal of the Companion (Mursal al-Ṣaḥābī), the Companion often reports a hadith from the Prophet without having actually heard it from the Prophet but heard it from another Companion and attributes the hadith directly to the Prophet. This may be due to the lower age of the Companion in question or due to his belated embrace of Islam; in either case it is not considered a serious weakness in the hadith. Al-Suyūṭī has stated that “the two Ṣaḥīḥ collections (al-Ṣaḥīḥayn) contain countless numbers of Mursal al-Ṣaḥābī, for most of what they have reported is from other Companions and they are all deemed to be upright.” The younger Companions have often reported hadith from the senior Companions and when they have reported hadith from the Followers, they have usually explained why. Mursal of the Companion is generally held to be as good as a muttaṣil, or connected hadith. This is because the missing link therein is, in all probability, another and probably a more senior Companion and that is not a serious defect although some have expressed reservations on this point as it is possible, although not very likely, that the Companion has actually relied on a Follower (tābiʿī).

Mursal is also sub-divided into several types beginning with the Mursal of a Companion who has seen the Prophet, as noted above, but his direct hearing of hadith from the Prophet is not proven. This is followed by Mursal of the Follower (tābiʿī) who embraced Islam while the Prophet was alive but did not actually meet the Prophet. This is also known as mukhadram such as Saʿd b. Iyās al-Shaybānī, Suwayd b. Ghafla and others; twenty of them have been mentioned altogether. Then comes the Mursal of prominent tābi‘i such as Sa‘īd b. Ibn al-Musayyib and ʿUbayd Allah b. ʿAdī b. al-Khiyār. Many have considered this as the principal variety of Mursal; this being a hadith that a leading Follower has attributed to the Prophet. And lastly Mursal of the minor figures among the Followers such as Qatāda, Hamid al-Ṭawil, Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhri, Yahyā b. Sa‘īd al-Anṣari and others. One who has heard from the Prophet when a disbeliever and then embraced Islam after the Prophet’s demise is a tābi‘i and there is no disagreement on this.

Only the Mursal of Companions is generally accepted, but the other types of Mursal are not. Even with regard to the Mursal of Companions, some scholars, such as Abū Ishāq al-Isfārā’īnī have expressed reservations by saying that unless it becomes known that the Companion in question has heard it from the Prophet or a fellow Companion, it is possible he may have received it from a non-Companion, that is a Follower, in which case it becomes unreliable. It has, however, been said in response that the case where a Companion might transmit hadith from a tābi‘i is rather unlikely and rare, and the Mursal of a Companion most likely refers to another Companion.12 Al-Nawawī has been quoted to have said that “the Mursal hadith is a weak hadith according to the vast majority of hadith scholars, al-Shāfi‘i, and most of the fuqahā‘ and jurisprudents of usūl.”13 This is because of ignorance of the condition of the missing link which may possibly be weak or may be a person other than a Companion even when it is known that the transmitter in question is one who only narrated hadith from reliable persons.

Munjāt is another type of Da‘if. This is a hadith in which there is a broken link in the ismād somewhere below the level of Companion or that it consists of a link that is ambiguous and vague. A hypothetical example of this might be when it is said that Mālik reported from Ibn ʿUmar, or that ‘a man’ reported from Ibn ʿUmar. This is because Mālik has not seen ʿAbd Allāh Ibn ʿUmar and there must have been an intervening link, which is unknown, although one might guess that it was Nāfi‘, but that guess is of no value. But if that link is clearly identified to be Nāfi‘, then it would be one of the strongest chains of ismād, which is known, among the ʿulamā‘ of hadith, as the Golden Chain. Mungatī is also a general term, especially to the ulamā' of usūl al-fiqh who tend to apply it to any ḥadith with a broken īsnād.

Muḍāl is another variety of Du‘īf in which the chain of īsnād consists of two broken links, one after the other. When it is said, for example, that Shāhī reported from ʻUmar, the link jumps over two generations consisting possibly of Mālik and Nāfi‘. This is even worse than Mungatī simply because two links are missing in the īsnād. An example of Muḍāl is the ḥadith that Imām Mālik has reported from Abū Hurayra that the Prophet, peace be on him, said “a slave is entitled to food and clothes in a decent manner, and may not be asked to do work that is beyond his capacity” (Al-Muwatta, Kitāb al-Isti‘dān, bāb al-amr bi‘l-rīfīq bi‘l-mamlūk).

This is a Muḍāl as Imām Mālik narrated it directly from Abū Hurayra, but it has elsewhere been reported as a Muttaṣīl (connected) ḥadith wherein Mālik reported it from Muḥammad b. ʻAjlān, from his father from Abū Hurayra (al-Ḥākim al-Nisābūrī, Ma‘rifat ʻUlūm al-Ḥadīth, p. 37).

Matrūk, or abandoned, is yet another variation of Du‘īf wherein the īsnād consists of a transmitter who is suspected of lying, be it concerning the ḥadith of the Prophet or lying in any other context. An example of Matrūk is the ḥadīth of al-Jārūd b. Yazīd al-Nisābūrī, from Bahz from his father, from his grandfather that the Prophet said “when anyone tells his wife: you are divorced as from next year, God willing, it is of no effect.”

إذا قال لأسرته: أنت طالق إلى سنة إن شاء الله فلا حنث عليه.

This is a Matrūk ḥadīth as al-Jārūd is suspected of lying and many scholars, including al-Dhahabī, have identified him as such.

Maqlūb (reversed) is also a weak ḥadīth and it consists of a reverse order of reading in its īsnād or its text. An example of reversal in the text is the ḥadīth of Abū Hurayra which both al-Bukhārī and Muslim have recorded that the Prophet, peace be on him, said “what I have prohibited to you—avoid it, and what I have commanded you to do—do it to the extent of your ability.”
Al-Ṭabarānī has reported this ḥadīth from Abū Hurayra in the reverse order, which brings the latter portion of the ḥadīth first so as to read “what I have commanded you to do – do it ...”. Reversal in the isnād, on the other hand, may involve the whole of the isnād, such as attaching the isnād of one ḥadīth to another ḥadīth, or it may involve reversal in names, such as Murra b. Ka'b, when rendered as Ka'b b. Murra.

Al-Mudraj (inserted) is another variety of Da'if which consists of inadvertently inserting the speech of a Companion, a Follower, or a hadīth transmitter into the text or isnād of the ḥadīth of the Prophet. Insertion in the text may occur at the beginning, middle, or end of the text. An example of insertion at the end is the hadīth reported by 'Abd Allāh b. Mas‘ūd who said that the Prophet, peace be on him, took him by his hand and taught him the tashahhud and said: “Say: at-tahiyātu bi-Allāhi waṣ-Salawātu, then the tashahhud, and said when you have cited this you have completed your ṣalāh; if you wish to stand up (and go) stand, or sit if you wish.”

Al-Ḥākim al-Nisābūrī wrote concerning this hadīth that the latter portion of it (i.e. when you have cited this ...) is ‘Abd Allāh b. Mas‘ūd's own statement which the narrator has mistakenly added to the hadīth.14

Munkar, which is another variety of Da'if, is a hadīth whose narrator cannot be confirmed to have fulfilled the prerequisites of 'adāla and retentiveness of memory and his hadīth is also contrary to one narrated by a more reliable narrator on the same subject. Munkar is similar to shādhdh with one difference, which is that in shādhdh the hadīth of a reliable narrator is contrary to one reported by many reliable narrators whereas reliability of the narrator of Munkar is doubtful.

Muḍṭarib (confounded) is also another variety of Da'if, and it refers to a hadīth the contents of which are inconsistent with a number of other aḥādīth, none of which can be preferred over the others.15 The confusion sometimes originates in conflicting reports from the same narrator. An example of this is the hadīth of Anas b. Mālik who said that he prayed behind the Prophet, as well as Abū Bakr and ʿUthmān, and heard them opening the salāh directly with the Sūra al-Fātiha without citing the bismala first. Elsewhere it has been reported from Anas that Anas was questioned concerning the basmala where he said that he had not known anything on this from the Prophet. Sometimes the confusion relates to a portion of the isnād such as when two narrators report a hadith with the same isnād but they differ with regard to one link therein. An example of the Muṭṭarib occurs in the matn of the following two hadiths, both of which are supported by acceptable isnāds. Fāṭima bt. Qays said that the Prophet was asked concerning the zakāh and he said: "property is liable to rights other than the zakāh." The same hadith has been reported in conflicting words wherein it is stated that "property is liable to no rights other than zakāh."

Neither of these can be preferred, nor can they be reconciled, hence a Muṭṭarib. Sometimes the confusion arises when the same hadith is reported as a Mursal by one and as Muṭṭasil by another. It may be possible to ascertain grounds by which one of the hadiths in question is given preference whereas this may not be feasible if the two reports are about equal in all respects and the confusion would therefore remain unresolved.

Duʿāʾ has once again been divided into two types, namely Duʿāʾ acting on which is not objectionable and this resembles the Hasan in the terminology of al-Tirmidhī. The second type of Duʿāʾ is that which is totally spurious, acting on which is not recommended, but there is some difference of opinion on this.

The 'ulamāʾ have held three different views with regard to acting on Duʿāʾ hadith. The first view is that it is of absolutely no value and should not be followed whether in reference to moral virtues (ṣadaqāʾ il wa mamāʾ iz) or to legal rules (aḥkām). This is the view of the leading 'ulamāʾ, including al-Bukhārī and Muslim, Yahyā b. Maʿīn, Abū Bakrā Ibn al-ʿArabī and that of the Zāhirī school. The proponents of this view have referred to the Qur'ānic directive to "take not a stand over something which you do not know" (al-Isrā', 17:36).
Since Da‘if fails to impart positive knowledge, it does not provide an adequate basis on which to determine a ruling of Shari‘a. It is better to act, in such cases, on the basis of personal reason (ra’y) rather than a weak hadith.

The second view validates Da‘if hadith generally and considers that acting upon a weak hadith is preferable to acting on personal opinion and ra’y. Imam Ahmad b. Hanbal and Abu Dawud al-Sijistani, among others, are associated with this view, but they rank such hadith below the sunna of Companion. It is noted, however, that the distinction between Da‘if and Sahih may not have been so clear-cut in Imam Ibn Hanbal’s time, and it seems likely that Imam Ahmad counted the Hasan as a variety of Da‘if. The Da‘if must, however, fulfil three conditions, one of which is that the weakness in it is slight and not dominant, and there is consensus on this. The second is that it is in harmony with the accepted norms and principles of Islam and there is nothing strange in it. Thirdly, it is not made the basis of belief as the possibility is not overruled that it may not be genuine.\(^\text{18}\)

The third view which is preferred by the fiqah and many ‘ulamā’ of hadith has it that a Da‘if hadith may be followed in moral virtues but not in legal injunctions (ahkām), provided that it fulfils certain conditions, namely that none of its narrators are implicated in lying and distortion of hadith, nor known as matrak al-hadith, that its message is in conformity with the valid norms and principles of Islam, and that acting on it is not accompanied by dogmatic belief.

Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ al-Shahrizuri (d. 643 H) advises that whenever one speaks of a Da‘if hadith, one should identify it as such and also specify if the weakness is only in the transmission (da‘if al-isnād). For it is possible that another chain of transmission may be found concerning the same hadith that is free of defect and would help to strengthen the isnād and elevate the hadith to the rank of Sahih. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ further advised that when one recites or transmits a Da‘if hadith without its isnād, one should avoid saying that “the Prophet, peace be on him, said such and such” in a definite tone of voice but should say instead that “it is reported from the Prophet, peace be on him,” or that a hadith in such and such terms has been transmitted to us and so forth. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ has, moreover, noted the tendency among the scholars of hadith that they tend to ignore weakness in the isnād of Da‘if hadiths.
when they refer to such ahādīth in the context of moral virtues and encouragement (al-targīh wa'larīḥīb), narratives and preaching outside the scope of the aḥkām. It is then recommended that one should not confuse the Da'if with the Sahīḥ ḥadīth and should clearly identify them for what they are.\textsuperscript{19}

Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ has also stated: "when they say that this ḥadīth is Sahīḥ," it means that it has a continuous isnād and a text that is free of defects and, as such, it fulfils all the requirements of a Sahīḥ ḥadīth, but it does not necessarily mean that it is true and authentic as a matter of certainty. For even in the Sahīḥ category there are ahādīth that are narrated by one upright narrator, and as such, the possibility of error and forgetfulness cannot be eliminated altogether. But for practical purposes this possibility is not given much attention in that a Sahīḥ ḥadīth does provide a valid basis of judgement and acting on it becomes obligatory. In a similar vein when "they say concerning a ḥadīth that it is not Sahīḥ – ghayr Sahīḥ," it does not mean decisively that it is a lie, for it is still possible that it is a true ḥadīth but has failed to have a valid isnād that fulfils all of its necessary requirements.\textsuperscript{20} Sometimes ḥadīth scholars use the expression Sahīḥ al-insād (sound of isnād) with regard to a Sahīḥ ḥadīth, which implies doubt in the accuracy of the text thereof. Another expression that is sometimes used is that a ḥadīth expert may identify a ḥadīth as asaḥh shay' fi'il-hāb (the best that there is on the subject). This expression does not imply that the ḥadīth is Sahīḥ, let alone the best of Sahīḥ; it may indeed mean that the ḥadīth is weak, or that it is the least weak of the ahādīth on the subject and that no stronger hadīth is available on that matter.\textsuperscript{21}

The 'ulamā' are not entirely consistent in their evaluation of hadīth into the Sahīḥ category for reasons that relate both to the requirements of Sahīḥ as well as qualifying or disqualifying certain individuals as upright and retentive. The first level of disagreement (ikhtilāf) concerns the minimum requirements of isnād. Whereas some 'ulamā' have stipulated for a Sahīḥ ḥadīth that it should qualify as a 'Azīz, which effectively means that it should have two separate isnāds, others have accepted into Sahīḥ ḥadīth which falls under the category of Gharīb. This last is a ḥadīth which is supported by a single narrator in at least some part of its chain of isnād. There thus arises a certain amount of ikhtilāf as to whether one or both of 'Azīz and Gharīb, or only one but not the other is accepted into the category of Sahih. This might explain the dual characterisation by al-Tirmidhi of some ahadith as Sahih Gharib. Disagreement could also arise over individual transmitters and ahadith as to whether a particular transmitter, or hadith, as the case may be, has fulfilled all or only some of the requirements of Sahih, with the consequence that the same hadith is evaluated by some 'ulama' as Sahih whereas others may have placed it under Hasan. Moreover, al-Tirmidhi has identified certain ahadith with the somewhat unusual terminology of “Hadith Hasan Sahih”. This has given rise to much debate among the scholars of hadith. What it simply means, however, is that the hadith is supported by two isnads, one of which qualifies it as Sahih and the other as Hasan, or else that there is only one isnad for the hadith which is considered as Hasan by some and Sahih by others.22

There is a tendency among the 'ulama' of hadith, when classifying a hadith under a certain category, whether Sahih, Hasan, or Da'i, to speak in a language that often amounts to a probability such that does not overrule the possibility of a remaining doubt. In their classification of hadith, the 'ulama' often draw the conclusion that this or that hadith has fulfilled the requirements of Sahih, or that its text has fulfilled these requirements. This manner of expression usually conveys some hesitation and differs from unqualified expressions that describe a hadith to be authentic beyond all doubt.23

As already noted, Da'i is not a monolithic category but consists of degrees of weakness in both the text and the isnad. Hadith experts have, in this connection, discussed the classes of weak narrators and have written monographic works on the subject. The very title, for example, of Muhammad Ibn Hibban al-Busti's (d. 354 H) work, Al-Majruhin min al-Muhaaddithin wa'l-Du'af' wa'l-Matrkin is indicative of this. Weakness can be attributed to character, to memory, and ignorance, etc., of the narrator and also to various aspects of the hadith itself.

Just as the 'ulama' were able to identify the most reliable isnad and its component names of transmitters, they have also identified and publicised the most spurious and unreliable isnads in conjunction usually with the leading Companions or in reference to particular localities. The most spurious isnad (ambal-asanad) with reference to Abu Bakr al-Siddiq is thus noted to consist of Sadaqa b. Musa al-
Daqiqi, from Farqad al-Subkhī, from Murra al-Tayyib from Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddiq. The weakest isnād with reference to 'A'isha Siddīqa is al-Hārith b. Shibl from Umm al-Nu‘mān al-Kindiyya from 'A'isha. With reference to Ibn 'Abbās the most spurious isnād is al-Suddī al-Ṣaghīr Muḥammad b. Marwān, from al-Kalbi, from Abū Śālih, from Ibn 'Abbās. Ibn Ḥajar al-'Asqalānī has called this a “string of lies—silsilat al-kadhib”. The weakest of all isnāds concerning 'Alī b. Abī Ṭalib is 'Amr b. Shinr, from Jābir al-Ju'fī, from Ḥārith al-‘Awār, from 'Alī. Similar information has been compiled concerning Abū Hurayra and others, as well as concerning transmitters from various places such as the Yemen, Egypt, al-Shām and Kūfā, etc. The weakest of the Yemenite isnād is thus said to be Ja'far b. 'Umar al-‘Adanī, from al-Ḥakam b. Abān, from `Ikrama from Ibn 'Abbās. Ḥadith that is transmitted through any of these so-called black-listed channels is classified as Matrūk (abandoned).

The 'ulamā' have often declared a ḥadith as Da'if even when only one link in its chain of isnād is known to be unreliable; for example, the ḥadith that “one who performs six units of (supererogatory) prayers after the (obligatory) Maghrib prayer without engaging in conversation in between would have earned the equivalent of twelve years of worship.”

The isnād of this ḥadith consists of 'Umar b. Rāshid, from Yahyā b. Kathīr, from Abū Salama, from Abū Hurayra, from the Prophet. The leading 'ulamā' of ḥadith, including Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, Yahyā b. Ma'in, Dāraqūṭnī, al-Bukhārī and Ibn Ḥibbān have all declared 'Umar b. Rāshid as unreliable and weak, as one whose report counts for nothing, and so forth. The ḥadith is thus identified as Da'if because of 'Umar b. Rāshid.

Many prominent contemporary 'ulamā' including Aḥmad Muḥammad Shākir, Naṣir al-Dīn al-Albānī, Yusuf al-Qaraḍāwī, 'Ajjaq al-Khaṭīb and Mannā al-Qaṭṭān have advocated the view that the Da'if should be abandoned altogether. I too believe that a restrictive approach to the admissibility of weak ḥadith is safer and in greater harmony with the objective of preserving the purity of ḥadith. To mix the weak with the general corpus of valid ḥadith is likely to undermine the credibility of the latter and it should be avoided. This may also be said generally regardless of the subject matter of ḥadith, whether it... relates to moral virtue (fadā'il), encouragement and warning (al-targhīb wa'l-tarhib), or the legal rules (aḥkām) of Shari'ā.

According to the general rule, the overall acceptability of a hadith is determined on the weakest element in its proof. Thus the presence of a single weak narrator in an otherwise sound isnād would weaken the hadith and take it out of the Sahih category altogether. A weak hadith does not constitute a Sharī'ī proof (hujja) and is therefore rejected. It will be noted, however, that the clear cases of rejection have already been largely identified and a hadith that is so rejected is labelled either as Matrūk (also known as Mātrūh) and Mawdū'. A hadith in the Da'īf category is not always of this type and one finds varying shades of weaknesses. To evaluate these, the rules of impugnment and validation (al-jarh wa'l-ta'dil) are employed. The 'ulamā' are inclined to be brief on validation (ta'dil) but more specific on impugnment (jarh). The tendency here is conveyed in the Arabic phrase al-īmāl fi'l-ta'dil wa'l-tašīl fi'l-tajrīh (brevity on validation but elaboration on impugnment). When a narrator is declared as trustworthy and 'adl, one usually does not find much elaboration of the grounds of such assessment, hence little detail as to whether the person in question was regular in the performance of prayer in congregation, fasting, etc. This is partly because the grounds of ta'dil can be numerous and cumbersome to itemise. But when it comes to impugnment, the nature and ground of the defect in the narrator, such as inaccuracy in reporting, confusion, defect of memory, distortion and lying, etc., are specified. Even here, it may be added, the tendency is to avoid unnecessary detail, for it is often deemed sufficient to specify a single defect in order to impugn the probity of a narrator, and this is what the 'ulamā' were inclined to do. This attitude may be further explained by saying that impugnment partakes in necessity (darūra) and invokes in turn the legal maxim that “necessity must be measured by its true proportions” (al-darūratu tuqaddaru bi-qadarīhā). This restrictive approach toward impugnment has often had the result that there is no need to mention two or three reasons to impugn someone if one is enough to achieve the same result.

Hadith has also been classified under several other categories which may, in turn, fall under any of the three classes of Sahih, Hasan and Da'īf, or that its relevance to any of these may not be self-evident. This is the subject that is taken up next.
This classification is predicated on the question as to who has actually uttered the ḥadīth, or to whom may it be attributed. The terms that are used for this classification are also descriptive of their purpose and consist of characterisations and adjectives (ṣifāʾ) that help a better understanding of ḥadīth, which are, however, not indicative of its placement on the three-point scale of Ṣaḥīḥ – Ḥasan – Ḥаḍīf. The classification we are about to review, in other words, does not look into the inner strength or weakness of ḥadīth but merely seeks to identify its origin and the likelihood or otherwise of it originating from the Prophet himself. There are several of these classifications, of which we only review the salient ones as follows.

Marṣūʿ (Elevated) and Mawqūf (Suspended)

The underlying idea of this classification is that a ḥadīth may sometimes consist of the statement or conduct of one or more Companions, which is then elevated and attributed to the Prophet himself, due to a strong, even irrebuttable, assumption that no one else could have validated it in the first place, even though a direct saying of the Prophet on it is not available on record. This procedure of elevating the saying of a Companion and its attribution directly to the Prophet is called raḥ (elevation) and the hadith is then identified as elevated (Marṣūʿ). For without this explanation, all ḥadīth are presumed to be originating from the Prophet and would all be considered Marṣūʿ, in which case there would remain no basis for the classification. A Marṣūʿ ḥadīth stands in contradistinction with Mawqīf (suspended); the latter refers to a ḥadith that stops at the level of the Companion and does not reach the Prophet himself. This is because the Companion has not attributed it to the Prophet nor is the subject such that an attribution of that kind could be taken for granted.

Murfū is a wide-ranging concept, much wider, one might say, than the Mawqīf, presumably because the underlying notion in all ḥadith is that they must originate in one way or another in the person of the Prophet. Since this is a focal point of reference in all ḥadith, the concept of Murfū becomes a wide-ranging one and tends to arise in reference to all ḥadith whose attribution to the Prophet is not self-evident and yet the subject is such that could not have escaped the attention of the Prophet.

Murfū may consist of a saying, act or tacit approval and it may likewise be a continuous (muttaṣil) ḥadith, or ghayr muttaṣil, that is, ḥadith with a broken īnād, which might include a Mursal. The subject matter of Murfū is such that it could only have been said or acted by the Prophet or that his approval can be taken for granted over it. The narrator may be a Companion, which would normally be the case, or it may be someone else, and often the narrator himself identifies it as Murfū. The subject matter of ḥadith often gives a better indication of it being a Murfū ḥadith. When a Companion says something concerning the text of the Qurʾān or the occasion of its revelation and the matter is such that he could not have said it entirely of his own opinion, it is classified as Murfū. According to an alternative definition, attributed to al-Baghdādi, Murfū consists of what a Companion has reported concerning a saying, act, tacit approval, or a personal attribute of the Prophet. The origin, in other words, is the Prophet, and the Companion also attributes it to the Prophet. This would preclude Mursal from the purview of Murfū. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ has added that according to this definition, Murfū is identical with muttaṣil, that is, ḥadith with a continuous īnād. This would also mean that Murfū does not include a discontinued, or ghayr muttaṣil, ḥadith.

When the saying of a Companion contains a reference such as “we were commanded to do such and such, or were forbidden from such and such, or we used to do such and such,” — this is usually classified under Murfū if it is attributed to the Prophet and the matter is such that could not have escaped the Prophet’s attention, provided also that it is attributed to the time of the Prophet. If the saying of the Companion is not so attributed to a general practice of the Companions or to the time of the Prophet, then it would fall under Mawqūf. An example of the former is the saying of the Companion, al-Mughīra b. Shu‘ba, that “the Companions of the Messenger of God used to knock at his door with their finger nails.”

بابه بالأظفار.

Although this is not a Musnad (hadith with a continuous isnād all the way back to the Prophet), it is very likely, nevertheless, to have come to the knowledge of the Prophet. Marfū’ in this sense also includes the saying of a Companion concerning the personal attributes of the Prophet. Another typical example of Marfū’ is the saying of the Companion, Jābir b. ‘Abd Allāh, concerning the rituals of the regular prayer (salāt): “we used to say takbīr when we rose and tasbih when we descended.”

Thus it is very likely that the Prophet had known of this and authorised it himself. Similarly the statement of Anas b. Mālik falls under Marfū’ when he said that “Bilāl was ordered to read the adhān in even (numbers) and the iqāma in odd”.

Mawqūf (suspended) is hadith that is attributed to the Companion; it may consist of words, action or tacit approval, but its isnād stops at that level and falls short of reaching the Prophet himself. Mawqūf may have a continuous chain of isnād up to the level of the Companion, in which case it would be a connected Mawqūf (al-Mawqūf al-mansūl). Should there be disruption in its isnād, however, it would be a disconnected Mawqūf (al-Mawqūf ghayr al-mansūl). This distinction is also true of Marfū’ in that a Marfū’ may be either connected (mutaṣābī), or disconnected (ghayr mutaṣābī). Mawqūf can also include suspended hadith below the level of the Companion, in which case the narrator would specify exactly where the suspension occurred (e.g.
Mawqūf upon Ṭāwūs, or ‘Aṭā’ or al-Zuhri). In the absence of such qualification, a Mawqūf normally means suspended at the level of the Companion only. The jurists of Khurāsān have drawn a parallel between Mawqūf and Athār as they equate the one with the other. A similar equation is drawn between Marjū and Khabar. The ‘ulamā’ of hadith, on the other hand, tend to use Athār as a general term that includes all of these.

As for a commentary on the Qurʾān that a Companion might have attempted, if it can be based on the opinion of the Companion, which he has also not attributed to the Prophet, it would fall under the Mawqūf. This also applies to commentaries that cannot be based on the personal opinion of the Companion, yet it is known that the Companion in question has been influenced by the ahl al-kitāb, especially the Jews, in advancing it. Thus the commentaries that some Companions have advanced with regard to the chapters of the Qurʾān and the hidden mysteries of creation and stories of bygone Prophets that were based on Isrāʾiliyāt – these are all classified under Mawqūf and further weakened if they sound contrary to reason and their attribution to the Prophet is unlikely and remote. Even if they were known to have attempted such due to pious motives, this will not add to the credibility of their comments. But if the Companion is known to have avoided Isrāʾiliyāt and says something which is not likely to be his own opinion, then it would qualify as Marjū. An example of this is the statement of the renowned Companion, ‘Abd Allāh b. Masʿūd, that “one who declares as true a sorcerer (al-sāḥir) or one who forecasts the future by employing the fortune teller (al-kāhin), he denies what is revealed to the Prophet Muhammad, peace be on him.” However, when a Companion advances an opinion that consists of his own thought and he does not attribute it to the Prophet either, it would be considered as his personal ijtihād which would not be binding on anyone, unless it is adopted by general consensus, in which case it would be binding.

Included in the Mawqūf are also the sayings of Followers (tābiʿūn) such as “we were ordered to do such and such or were forbidden from such and such.” This is also the case with regard to such statements of a tābiʿī that in his time, or in earlier times “the Sunna was such and such.” There is some disagreement as to whether some such statements would qualify as Marfū', Murṣal or Mawqūf, but the correct position is that they are Mawqūf. An example of this is the saying of the tābi‘ī, ʿUbayd Allah b. ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿUtba that “according to Sunna, the prayer leader on the day of Fīr and the day of (Eid) al-Adhā is to sit on the pulpit and read the takbir seven times prior to the sermon (khutba).” Al-Shāfi‘ī, al-Nawawī, and al-Bayhaqī among others have held this to be Mawqūf, although it is reported that initially al-Shāfi‘ī had said it was Marfū' but later changed his view over it and considered it to be Mawqūf.7

As for the question whether Mawqūf (of the Companion) is a weak ḥadīth because its attribution to the Prophet is uncertain, it is suggested that there is weakness among the Mawqūf and much of the Isrā‘iliyyāt tend to creep into it, just as there is also sound and fair (Ṣaḥīh and Hasan) in the Mawqūf. Thus it may be said that Mawqūf qua Mawqūf is not necessarily all weak. This is true especially of that variety of Mawqūf wherein the Companion does not speak of his own opinion and ra'y but of something that can be presumed to have been authorised by the Prophet. This type of Mawqūf may even qualify as Ṣaḥīh or Hasan that can provide a valid proof and basis of judgement. What needs to be stated is that the rules of usūl al-ḥadīth, be it related to Ṣaḥīh, Hasan, or Da‘īf, should be applied to Mawqūf in order to determine strength and weakness therein and not to dismiss it all simply because it is Mawqūf.8

Muttaṣil (connected) and Maqṭū' (broken)

Muttaṣil, or Mawṣūl is defined as ḥadīth with a continuous isnād in which every narrator has received the ḥadīth from his immediate link above. The isnād may be continuous all the way back to the Prophet himself, in which case it would also be Marfū' and Musnad or it may reach up to the level of the Companion and thus qualify as a Mawqūf. Al-Khaṭṭīb al-Baghdādī has equated Muttaṣil with Musnad which would evidently confuse the Muttaṣil to Marfū', but this equation tends to amount to what Ṣubḥī al-Ṣāliḥ has described as the dominant usage (ghalabat al-isti'māl). It is, in other words, very likely that Muttaṣil would also be Marfū', but not always. The equation is somewhat similar to al-Baghdādī’s other equation which he drew between Murṣal and Munqāfi. This too contemplates the most likely situation which may not always be the case. Ibn al-Salah has also noted that the Muttaṣil may include not only the Marfūh but also the Mawqūf hadith.

As for the question whether the saying of the Followers (tābiʿūn) which are transmitted through a continuous isnād can also be included under Muttaṣil – it is suggested that Muttaṣil in its unqualified usage does not include this, but the term Muttaṣil may be used if it is qualified with the name of the tābiʿī in question. Thus it may be said that “this is Muttaṣil up to Saʿid b. al-Musayyib,” otherwise it would be classified as Maqṭūh. Ibn al-Salah prefers to confine Muttaṣil to Marfūh and Mawqūf only.

And lastly Maqṭūh is a ḥadith that is suspended at the level of a leading figure among the Followers (tābiʿūn) such as Saʿid b. al-Musayyib, Ibrāhīm b. Yazīd al-Nakhaʾī (d. 96), Masrūq b. al-Ajdaʾ (d. 62), ʿAsān al-Baṣrī (d. 111) and others. This is different from Munqāfi, which is elsewhere explained under the general category of Daʾīf, although it is said that al-Shāfiʿī and also al-Ṭabarānī have used the two interchangeably. This was, however, as al-Suyūṭī explained, before the terminology was firmly established. Maqṭūh may also consist of saying, action or tacit approval that is attributed to a tābiʿī. Imām Abū Ḥanīfa considers it weak, so much so that it fails to provide a valid basis of judgement, and he prefers acting on analogy (qiyās) over Maqṭūh. It is said that only the Maqṭūh which is attributed to leading figures among the Followers who met with the leading Companions may be taken as evidence. The leading Followers include Saʿid b. al-Musayyib, al-Shaʾbī, al-Nakhaʾī and Masrūq.

Muʿanʿin (from from), Muʿannan (that that), and Muʿallaq (hanging)

Muʿanʿin is ḥadith with an isnād in which “so and so narrates from so and so (i.e. fulān ʿan fulān)” is used without actually specifying the manner of its reception between the two links whether by direct hearing or other methods. The isnād of such ḥadith is considered unbroken and continuous (muttaṣil), nevertheless, if it fulfils the following three conditions: firstly that the narrator is an upright person (ʿadl), secondly that he actually met with his immediate source, and lastly that the hadith is clear of taddīs. The mere possibility of a meeting between the narrator and his source is not enough to fulfil these requirements.

Mu‘an’in is very frequent in both al-Bukhārī and Muslim and most other collections of hadith, but compared to al-Bukhārī, it is more frequent in Muslim for the simple reason that Muslim did not require that his narrators should have actually met one another. Muslim went on record to explain his position on this in the introduction to his Sahih Muslim and how he omitted the condition of actual encounter despite the fact that many of his senior colleagues and predecessors, including al-Bukhārī and ‘Ali al-Madini had stipulated and applied it. Muslim maintained instead that narration by way of ‘an’ana and mu‘an’in is normal and must be held to mean that the narrator has actually heard his teacher if they are contemporaries and trustworthy individuals.

Many of the leading ‘ulamā’ of hadith have expressed reservations over Muslim’s position on this. Thus according to Ibn al-‘Salāh “what Muslim has said is debatable. It is also noted that Muslim actually went against the leading Imāms of hadith, namely ‘Ali b. al-Madini and al-Bukhārī on this.” Ibn al-‘Salāh is not alone as many others have held similar views, some of whom have actually equated Mu‘an’in hadith to Mursal, which they do not consider to amount to valid evidence unless it is proven to be muttaṣil. It is thus stated, and rightly so, that in the event where direct hearing (samā’) is established between the narrator and his teacher or, the use of words whether in the form of Mu‘an’in or other similar expressions should matter little and the hadith that is consequently reported will be considered as Muttaṣil. This can also be said if the narrator and his shaykh are known to have actually met, provided that there is no ambiguity and taddīs is overruled. Şubḥi al-‘Sāliḥ has referred to Ibn Ḥajar al-`Asqalānī’s view on this and considered it authoritative. Al-`Asqalānī has distinguished the following three different positions concerning ‘an’ana: Firstly, that ‘an’ana is normally equivalent to hadathanā (so and so spoke to us) and akhbaranā (so and so informed us); secondly, that it does not imply these when uttered by a muddallīs (concealer); and thirdly, that it is equivalent to akhbaranā that is used to imply grant of permission (ijāza). There is continuity (ittisāl) in all of these but some fall short of direct hearing (samā’) which is the most reliable method of reception.
and transmission.\textsuperscript{17} Mu'\textsuperscript{an} in is thus considered a Mutta\textsuperscript{a}il (connected) hadith unless there is evidence to suggest that this is not the case.

Similar doubts have been voiced concerning the Mu'\textsuperscript{an}ann. This is a hadith with an \textit{isn\textsuperscript{a}d} wherein the particle \textit{\textasciitilde an} (that) occurs and tends to introduce an element of ambiguity as to the actual method of communication between the narrator and his immediate source. For example “so and so narrated to us \textit{that} so and so said” (\textsl{haddathan\textsuperscript{a} ful\textsuperscript{a}n anna ful\textsuperscript{a}nan yaq\textsuperscript{a}ul...}). Imam M\textsuperscript{al}ik has considered this to be equivalent to Mu'\textsuperscript{an}in. Thus when the narrator says “\textit{\textasciitilde an ful\textsuperscript{a}n}” (from so and so) or “anna ful\textsuperscript{a}nan q\textsuperscript{a}la” (that so and so said) - the two phrases are about the same. According to Abu Bakr Ahmad b. H\textsuperscript{a}r\textsuperscript{u}n al-Bardijj, a scholar from Azerbaijan, the Mu'\textsuperscript{an}ann is different from Mu'\textsuperscript{an}in as the former implies discontinuity (\textit{inqi\textsuperscript{a}t}) unless direct hearing is proven with regard to the hadith in question, even if it be through a different source. Al-Suy\textsuperscript{u}ti who has referred to al-Bardijj then concluded that the correct position is what Imam M\textsuperscript{al}ik has held in that \textit{\textasciitilde an} is equivalent to \textit{\textasciitilde an} and both imply continuity (\textit{itt\textsuperscript{s}\textsuperscript{a}l}) provided that actual meeting (\textit{al-\textsuperscript{a}l\textsuperscript{a}}) has occurred and the hadith is clear of \textit{ta\textsuperscript{d}\textsuperscript{i}s}, in which case both indicate direct hearing (\textit{sam\textsuperscript{a}}). It is then stated that in cases where \textit{isn\textsuperscript{a}d} reaches a Companion, it matters little whether the Companion uses one or the other of these expressions, or any equivalent thereof – all would indicate \textit{itt\textsuperscript{s}\textsuperscript{a}l}. Thus when a Companion narrates in such words “the Prophet, peace be on him, said – q\textsuperscript{a}la Ras\textsuperscript{u}l All\textsuperscript{a}h,” or “anna Ras\textsuperscript{u}l All\textsuperscript{a}h q\textsuperscript{a}la,” or “\textit{\textasciitilde an Ras\textsuperscript{u}l All\textsuperscript{a}h anna\textsuperscript{u}h q\textsuperscript{a}la},” or “sam\textsuperscript{u}tu Ras\textsuperscript{u}l All\textsuperscript{a}h anna\textsuperscript{u}h yaq\textsuperscript{a}l” – all of these are equivalent expressions. But then again, it is said that this is the privilege of the Companions. So the debate continues, but even so the general position that is stated by Imam M\textsuperscript{al}ik, Ibn al-\textsuperscript{\texta}l\textsuperscript{a}\textsuperscript{h}, al-Suy\textsuperscript{u}ti and others still remains.\textsuperscript{18} I do not, however, propose to engage in further detail here due to the subtleties of Arabic expressions.

The Mu'\textsuperscript{a}llaq (lit. hung) is a hadith in which one or more links are omitted from the beginning of \textit{isn\textsuperscript{a}d} at the lower end, or any other part thereof. Sometimes the entire \textit{isn\textsuperscript{a}d} is omitted where the person quoting a hadith simply says “the Prophet, peace be on him, said ...” or when it is said in reference to a Companion that “Ibn \textquoteleft Abb\textquoteleft as said such and such” or “Ab\textquoteleft H\textquoteleft urayra narrated such and such,” or “Sa\textquoteleft id b. al-Musayyib said while quoting Ab\textquoteleft H\textquoteleft urayra ...”.
This manner of reference to ḥadith became increasingly widespread after the documentation of the bulk of ḥadith and proliferation of scholarly writings on it. Writers often did not mention the whole of the isnād but merely referred to the two ends of its chain of transmission such as “al-Bukhārī reported on the authority of Abū Bakr” or similar other expressions that merely attempted to identify the isnād without giving any of its details. Works compiled after the fourth century hijra, such as al-Khaṭīb al-Ṭabarī’s Mishkāt al-Maṣābīḥ, for example, quoted the ḥadith from the six major collections and frequently employed this manner of reference to the isnād of the ḥadith. Even in Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī itself numerous ḥadith cited are of Muʿallaq variety, so much so that Ḥāfīz Ibn Kathīr wrote a book on al-Bukhārī entitled Taqīḏ al-Taʿlīq (closure of the suspended) in which he filled in the missing parts of al-Bukhārī’s taʿlīqāt as they were already known. Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim is also said to contain 14 aḥādīth of this type. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ has observed in this connection that al-Bukhārī employed taʿlīq usually with reference to a very well-known ḥadith, or that he did so because he had elsewhere given the full isnād.

According to the rules that the ‘ulamā’ of ḥadith have generally upheld, the Muʿallaq aḥādīth of al-Bukhārī are considered as Ṣaḥīḥ if the suspension is made in decisive words, such as qāla (said), faʿala (did), amara (commanded), nahā (prohibited), dhakara (mentioned) rawā (narrated) and so on. Suspension (taʿlīq) would not convey validity and soundness (ṣīḥa) if it occurs in a defective form or expression (ṣighat al-tamrīd) such as “it is narrated from so and so” (yurmāʿan kadāhā ma kadāhā), “it is said of him” (yuqālu ʿanhu), “it is mentioned, or narrated” (yuddkaruu, yuḥkā) and the like, which are in any case usually not employed in the typical cases of taʿlīq.¹⁹

It is inadvisable to consider that the three ḥadith varieties of Muʿānʾin, Muʿānnan and Muʿallaq are necessarily weak. They may qualify as Ṣaḥīḥ, or Ḥasan or Daʿīf depending on the specifications of their respective isnāds and the individual narrators therein.
Hadith Classification III

Fard, Gharib, 'Aziz, Mashhur, Mutawatir, and Ahad

Hadith classifications that are reviewed in this chapter are also premised on the number of narrators in their isnad without any reference to the placement of hadith on the three-point scale of Sahih - Hasan - Da'if. The classification thus begins with hadith that is narrated by one person (Fard) or a single chain of isnad, and the 'Aziz, which is narrated by two persons at every level, and then Mashhur and so forth. These are separately addressed as follows.

Fard (single) and Gharib (strange)

Fard is described as a hadith that only one Companion has narrated from the Prophet, even if the hadith has become well-known and reported by many at the lower levels of the isnad. An example of this is the hadith which proclaims that "Acts are to be judged/evaluated by their intentions." Only one Companion, namely 'Umar b. al-Khattab, has narrated it from the Prophet although it has subsequently become so well-known that it has found its way into almost all the six major hadith collections. Fard is subdivided into two types, namely absolute, that is, al-Fard al-Mu'tlaq, and relative, al-Fard al-Nisbi.

Absolute Fard is a hadith that is narrated by literally a single Companion, as was the case with the above example. Relative Fard refers to a hadith that narrators from only a single place, or a single teacher or group have reported. The application of Fard to this type of hadith is relative in the sense that it may have actually been narrated by many but they all belong to the same locality or group—such as the people of Kūfa, or Baṣra or Madīna, etc. When Fārd is used without further qualification, it usually means absolute Fārd, and this is not synonymous with Shādhdh. For Shādhdh is basically a Fārd which also opposes another more reliable hadith that is reported by many, and it is on this ground that Shādhdh and Fārd differ from each other.²

An example of Fārd Nisbī which is narrated by the people of one locality from a single person is the ḥadīth of Ibn Burayda who said that he never held a judicial post after he heard the following ḥadīth from his father: “Judges are of three types, two of whom are in Hell and one in Paradise. The two include a judge who knowingly renders a wrong judgement, and one who renders a wrong judgement unknowingly. The judge who is in Paradise is one who renders a right judgement.”³

القضاء ثلاثة، فإنثنان في النار وواحد في الجنة: فأما الإثنان
قضاء قضى بغير الحق وهو يعلم فهو في النار، وقضاء قضى
بغير الحق وهو لا يعلم فهو في النار. وأما الواحد الذي في
الجنة فقضاء بالحق فهو في الجنة.

Al-Ḥākim al-Nisābūrī wrote that this hadith has only been reported by the people of Khurāsān (khurāsāniyyūn) and its narrators are all from Marw (in Bukhārā).

Gharīb is similar to Fārd to begin with, but it may differ with it at the lower levels of the isnād. Gharīb is defined as a ḥadīth which is narrated by only one narrator at any one link of its isnād, be it the middle, lower or upper end. So long as there is a link in the isnād which consists of a single narrator, this would qualify the hadith as Gharīb. It may thus be said that every Fārd is also a Gharīb but not vice versa. An example of Gharīb is the ḥadīth narrated by Muḥammad b. Sūqah, from Muḥammad b. al-Munkadir, from Jābīr b. ʿAbd Allāh that the Prophet, peace be on him, said concerning Islam: “This religion is firm so penetrate into it gently without causing yourself repulsion in the worship of God. For a camel rider who does not take rest breaks the animal’s back without traversing the earth.”

الله فإن المنبت لا أرضًا قطع ولا ظهرًا أبقى.
Al-Ḥākim al-Nisābūrī wrote concerning this hadith that no one except Muḥammad b. Sūqah reported it from Muḥammad b. al-Munkadīr. Another example of Gharīb is the hadith that ‘Abd Allāh b. Dinār narrated from ‘Abd Allāh b. ‘Umar that “The Prophet, peace be on him, prohibited sale and gift of clientage (al-walā’).”

 إن النبي صلى الله عليه وسلم نهى عن بيع الولاء وهبته.

To classify a hadith either as Gharīb or Fard does not necessarily imply its strength or weakness on the Sahīh - Ḥasan - Da’if scale of evaluation. For placing a hadith on this scale would all depend on the conditions of its narrators and reliability of its isnād. Having said this, however, most of the Gharīb hadith are likely to be weak. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ has given many examples of Gharīb and has stated that al-Zuhāri has recorded no less than ninety aḥādīth of this type and some of them have also found their way into the Sahīḥāyn.

‘Azīz (strong) and Mashhūr (well-known)

Al-‘Azīz is a hadith in which at least one link in its isnād consists of two narrators, even if the other links include more than two provided that none of the links in the isnād consists of less than two narrators. It is called ‘Azīz (a derivative of ‘izzā) as it is said to be strong and consequently infrequent (qālīlan). The strength here refers to the minimum of two narrators in every link of the isnād. An example of ‘Azīz is the hadith wherein the Prophet declared that “None of you believes (truly) unless he loves me more than his father and son.”

This hadith has been narrated by two Companions, Anas b. Mālik and Abū Hurayrā. Then Qatāda b. Di‘āma and ‘Abd al-‘Azīz b. Ṣuhayb narrated it from Anas, and then Shu‘ba and Ḥusayn al-Muʿallim narrated it from Qatāda, and Ismā‘īl b. ‘Aliyya and ‘Abd al-Wārith narrated it from ‘Abd al-‘Azīz b. Ṣuhayb, then many more narrated it afterwards.

‘Azīz may be a sound/Sahīh hadith due to the reliability of its narrators or it may qualify as Ḥasan or even Da’if, notwithstanding the number of its narrators. To qualify a ḥadith as such is a question, once again, of the conditions of its narrators in the isnād, and not necessarily of their number.

When the number of narrators at every link of the isnād is no less than three, the ḥadith would be classified as Mashhūr. It is called Mashhūr (widespread, well-known) because of the larger number of narrators that are involved in its isnād. It is important to note that Mashhūr must have become well-known and widespread during the first three generations of the advent of Islam, as following that period, most ahādidh are believed to have become widespread and well-known. An example of Mashhūr is the following ḥadith which declares the basic attribute of a Muslim: “A Muslim is one from whose tongue and hand other Muslims are safe.”

It is to be noted once again that a well-known or Mashhūr ḥadith is not necessarily a Šahih/Sound ḥadith, as it may well fall under the Ḥasan or even Daʿīf categories depending on the condition of its narrators in the isnād. Authenticity and soundness according to ḥadith experts is not determined on the quantitative factor of the number of transmitters, nor indeed on how well-known, or less well-known, a ḥadith might be. Attention is paid instead to the reliability of the narrators, whether one, two or more, and the strength and weakness of hadith is evaluated on that basis. A Šahih hadith is not defined, for example, as hadith which is reported by a certain number of narrators. This is the basic position, but al-Ḥakim al-Nīṣābūrī has suggested nevertheless that a Šahih hadith must be no less than ‘Azīz and that Fard and Gharīb may not be evaluated as Šahih. Yet he also pointed out that a Mashhūr hadith does not necessarily qualify as Šahih. It thus remains to be said that al-Ḥakim al-Nīṣābūrī does not actually lay down conditions but says what would seem to be the most likely situation – when he says, for example, that Fard and Gharīb do not measure up to the level of Šahih.

Al-Ḥakim has actually given many examples of Mashhūr which fail to qualify as Šahih, and this includes the following: “pursuit of knowledge is an obligation of every Muslim”; “There is no nikāh... without the ṭalib; "May God gladden a person who hears my speech and retains it ...".¹⁰

طلاب العلم فريضة على كل مسلم.
نصر الله أمرءاً سمع مقالتي فوعاها...

The following are some examples of the Maskhûr hadîth which are also included in the Sahîh category: "I have been commanded to prostrate on seven organs (of the body)"; "every good deed partakes in charity"; "one who comes to the Friday prayer, let him take a bath."¹¹ Al-Ḥâkim has also given examples of ḥadîth that have become well-known and widespread but which are weak/Ğaḍîf and even worthless.

كل معروف صدقئة.
من أئتي الجمعة فاغتسل.

The diffusion (ishtihâr) of a hadîth is also a relative concept to some extent in that a hadîth may be well-known in certain quarters but not in others. An example of this is the hadîth, that "Divorce is the most detested of all permissible things in the eyes of God."

أبغض الحلال إلى الله الطلاق.

This is said to be well-known among the jurists/ğuğâhâ, whereas the hadîth "My community will not be taken to task for mistake, forgetfulness, and duress" is well-known among the 'ulamâ' of usûl (jurisprudence).

There are also ahâdîth which are better known among the grammarians and the general public, but not so among the scholars of ḥadîth and so on.¹² Well-known as some ahâdîth are in some quarters, this factor of relativity by itself is not taken into account in the definition of Maskhûr, which is basically a hadîth that is narrated by a minimum of three narrators in every link of its isnād. One might also add here in passing that what al-Ḥakim al-Nisābūrī has written about the relative fame of a certain hadith in some quarters but not in others is also relative and liable to change. Some of the statements that he made then may not be applicable in the same way at the present time.

Mutawātir (recurrent), Āhād (solitary)

This is basically an extension of the previous classification as it is also premised on the number of transmitters involved in the isnād of hadith. The Āhād and Mutawātir classification tends to acquire greater significance in ṣūf al-fiqh than it does in ṣūf al-hadith. This may partly be due to the fact that ṣūf al-fiqh is basically a science of the proofs and sources of Shari'a and the number of hadith transmitters in an isnād consequently becomes the focus of attention more so in ṣūf al-fiqh than the ṣūf al-hadith. For the latter is basically concerned, not so much with numbers, but with the qualifications of hadith transmitters. Thus the Āhād – Mashhūr – Mutawātir trio of the ṣūf al-fiqh leaves its centre stage and tends to give way, in the context of ṣūf al-hadith, to the Ṣaḥīh – Ḥasan – Daʿīf classification, which is more focused on merit, uprightness, knowledge, retentiveness and so on of individual narrators of hadith. A hadith may be identified as Ṣaḥīh even if it is transmitted by a single but strong and reliable narrator as the criterion here is not the number but the credentials of individual narrators. A Ṣaḥīh hadith may also be one that is transmitted by two, three, or a much larger number throughout its chain of isnād or only in some of its parts. Thus it would follow that a Ṣaḥīh hadith may be an Āhād, Mashhūr or Mutawātir. The number of transmitters in the isnād is not entirely irrelevant to qualifying a hadith as a Ṣaḥīh hadith but it is not the defining element, so to speak, of a Ṣaḥīh hadith.

Mutawātir is defined as a hadith narrated by a large number of people, so much so that it is inconceivable that they could have all collaborated in order to perpetuate a lie. That possibility is precluded owing to the large number, diversity of residence, locality and time of the narrators. A Mutawātir report must by definition be based on sense perception and not on any other ground such as the rationality of its message or because it merely conveys what is a matter of axiomatic knowledge. To say that the world has a creator or that telling the truth is a virtue need not be supported by Mutawātir as these are rational and axiomatic.

The narrators of Mutawātir are not required to meet the qualifications of 'adāla and retentiveness in the same way as is required in Āḥād hadith. This is because in Mutawātir credibility is given solely to the multitude and number and not to personal qualifications. Thus the narrator of Mutawātir can include anyone, including children. They need not even be Muslims. Thus if the entire population of a town, who are non-Muslims, report that they witnessed a huge fire, or explosion in their town, this would engender certainty and knowledge beyond dispute.

A hadith is classified as Mutawātir only when the number of its reporters in every generation is large enough to preclude the possibility of collusion to propagate a lie. Hadith would thus fail to qualify as Mutawātir if its reporters are found to be biased or associated with one another through a political or sectarian movement. There is no specified minimum nor a maximum for the number of reporters of Mutawātir, although various figures from as low as four to as high as several hundred have been mentioned. To inspire certainty and conviction is the basic purpose, and this can hardly be linked to a particular number. Certainty can sometimes be inspired by a relatively small number if it is also endorsed by corroborative evidence. The number of reporters in a Mutawātir must, however, remain large from the start to the end of the isnād. A hadith would therefore fail to qualify as Mutawātir if the number of its narrators are reduced at any point in its isnād. There is no objection to an increase in the number of narrators. Thus if the number of narrators in one generation is thirty and it is increased to forty, this would be seen as a positive rather than a negative factor.

Mutawātir hadith is of two types, namely verbal Mutawātir, or Mutawātir lafżī, which consists of the verbatim transmission of the sayings of the Prophet, of which there are very few in existence, and Mutawātir in meaning, or Mutawātir Ma'namī, which are quite frequent. Mutawātir in meaning may consist of several reports through different channels which tend to support a common theme and meaning between them. An example of the verbal Mutawātir is the hadith that

This hadith has been narrated by a number of Companions including ʿAli b. Abī Ṭālib, al-Zubayr b. al-ʿAwwām, Anas b. Mālik, Salama b. al-Akwa', and Abū Hurayra; many more have narrated it from each of them in the same as well as in the next generation, and the number of its narrators has thus multiplied manyfold further down the line of its chain of transmission.

An example of the Mutawātir Maʾnawi is the sum total of the various hadith reports that have been known on the raising of hands (ραʾ al-yadayn) at the time of supplication (duʿāʾ). There are numerous reports that confirm this, and although each one of these, if taken individually, would only count as an Aḥād hadith, the common theme and purport of them amounts to Mutawātir. A theoretical example of this is the generosity of the legendary Ḥātim, who may have given small or large amounts of gifts, hospitality and help to various people, but when all of these are put together they support a common theme which is the generosity of Ḥātim. This may also be said with regard to so many other things, such as the manner in which the mudā’ is performed, or the way the prayer leader leads the zalāh, the manner that the ḥajj is performed and so on.

Mutawātir conveys certainty (al-ʿilm al-yaqīn) which may not be open to challenge or doubt and the ruling that is established by it is also decisive in respect of proof. Critics have, however, maintained that Mutawātir is in effect a large number of solitary (Aḥād) reports put together. If the component parts of Mutawātir can be open to doubt, then Mutawātir also does not eliminate doubt. There may be an element of truth in this, especially in our own time when we witness unprecedented developments in media and communications. A news report can become widespread overnight and everyone who is exposed to it may also accept it but that by itself does not guarantee its certainty and truth. But this response need not be projected backwards in the context of hadith. It is just that the notion of Mutawātir may need to be adjusted in the context of recent developments and news reports. The conventional response to the critique that is discussed here is that the individual components of Mutawātīr may be open to doubt but that the sum total of the Āhād reports is not the same as the individual Āhād components thereof. On the contrary Mutawātīr does engender positive knowledge when it fulfils all of its requirements.

The ʻulamā’ have also differed as to the existence and scope of the first type, that is, the verbatim Mutawātīr in ḥadīth. Some like Ibn Hibbān al-Bustī have denied the existence of this type of Mutawātīr altogether, whereas Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ has held it to be rare. Ibn Ḥajar al-ʻAsqalānī, Ibn Hazm al-Zāhirī, Qāḍī ʻIyād, Jalāl al-Dīn al-Suyūṭī and others have held that they are not rare. Ibn Ḥajar even criticised Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ for having said that Mutawātīr Lafzī is rare. Al-Suyūṭī has also authored a book bearing the title Al-Azhār al-Mutanāthira fi’l-Akhbār al-Mutawātīra (scattered flowers in Mutawātīr reports), which he later summarised in his Qasf al-Azhār (plucking the flowers) where the author compiled a collection of such ahādīth. Included in this collection are the following ahādīth: (1) “Every intoxicant is wine and all wine is forbidden”; (2) “May Allah felicitate the person who heard my speech...”; (3) “Everyone will find easy that for which he has been created”; and “Islam began as a stranger...” and so forth.

نصر الله أمره ما سمع مقالتي.
كل ميسر لما خلق له.
بدأ الإسلام غريبا.

Al-Bukhārī and Muslim have also recorded a number of ahādīth, one of which is that “The Prophet, peace be on him, wiped over his boots (or long leather socks)”.

Many scholars, including Ibn Ḥajar, have held that this is a Mutawātīr narrated by seventy to eighty narrators in every generation, including the ‘āshara mubahshara (the ten whom the Prophet greeted as dwellers of Paradise) among the Companions.

Al-Bukhārī and Muslim have also recorded the ḥadīth on the “visual sight of God Most High” on the Day of Resurrection (ru’yat Allah fil-akhirāt), and also the ḥadīth al-hawḍ wherein the Prophet described his hawḍ (water basin, pool) in the Hereafter and so on.
The Āhād (solitary), also known as khabar al-wāhid, implies a ḥadīth that is narrated by one transmitter, but this understanding is not always accurate. Āhād is actually defined as a ḥadīth that does not fulfil the requirements of Mutawātir. It may have been narrated by one, two or three persons at every level or the number may vary, but their number does not reach that of the Mutawātir. This is why Āhād according to the majority of ḥadīth scholars and jurists includes the Gharīb, ʿAzīz and Mashhūr.

Only the Ḥanafīs have interposed the last of these, namely the Mashhūr, in between the Āhād and Mutawātir. The Ḥanafīs have thus defined Āhād as a ḥadīth the number of whose narrators are less than that of Mutawātir, and it has not become widespread to the extent of the Mashhūr during the first three generations. As such the Āhād is neither confined to a single narrator nor is it necessarily a weak ḥadīth, but it can include the weak ḥadīth in the category of Fard and Gharīb. The ‘ulamā’ of usūl al-fiqh and ḥadīth have laid down a number of requirements that the transmitter of Āhād ḥadīth must fulfil before it can form valid Sharīʿ evidence. These are roughly the same requirements as the narrator of Ṣaḥīḥ must fulfil, namely competence, ʿadāla, retentiveness and so on. The narrator of Āhād must be a competent person and also a Muslim at the time of transmitting the ḥadīth, but not necessarily at the time of receiving it. When these requirements are met and the ḥadīth is free from obvious and hidden defects, it is decisive evidence according to the Zāhirīs and Ḥanbalīs but it is less than decisive (i.e. ṣanīʿ) according to the majority of the madhāhib. The leading madhāhib such as the Ḥanafīs and Mālikīs have also proposed some of their own conditions to verify reliability and strength of the Āhād ḥadīth.¹⁶

Imām Mālik has thus considered the ʿamal ahl al-Madīna, or the Madīnese practice, to be preferable to Āhād ḥadīth in the event of a conflict arising between the two. This the Imām justified on the analysis that the Madīnese practice is the true reflection of the teachings and Sunna of the Prophet and as such it is more reliable than the reports of odd individuals. One case of such conflict arose between the Madīnese practice and the ruling of the Āhād ḥadīth concerning khiyār al-majlis, or the option of contractual session. The ḥadīth in question provided that “the parties to a sale have the option (to revoke their contract) until they part company." The ḥadith thus entitled the parties to khīyār al-mājlis, which meant they could revoke their contract during the continuation of the session or meeting of contract, but not afterwards. Imām Mālik on the other hand upheld the Madinese practice on this subject and disentitled the contracting parties to khīyār al-mājlis. The Madinese practice, according to the Imām, was that a contract became binding and enforceable as of the moment a valid offer and acceptance took place. This was effectively the moment when an agreement had come into being and from that point onwards the parties had no option to revoke it.

The Ḥanafī madhhab also stipulated three conditions that the Āḥād ḥadith must fulfil in order to constitute a proof and basis of judgement. One of these was that the narrator of Āḥād is not known to have acted against it himself. Should it be known that the narrator had actually acted contrary to his own report, this would mean the report is unreliable. It was on this ground that the Ḥanafis did not rely on the Āḥād ḥadīth narrated by Abū Hurayra because it was known that he did not act on it himself. The ḥadith stipulated that “when a dog licks a dish, wash it seven times, one of which must be with clean sand.”

The second condition that the Ḥanafis have proposed is that the content of the Āḥād ḥadīth is not such that would necessitate the knowledge of a vast number of people. One would in that eventuality expect that more than one person would report such a ḥadīth, and the fact that only one has done so makes the ḥadīth doubtful. One such ḥadīth that the Ḥanafis have not accepted is “Anyone of you who touches his sexual organ must refresh his ablution.”

And lastly, in the event of a conflict between the Āḥād ḥadīth and the normal principles of Shari'a, the Āḥād ḥadīth would be followed if its narrator is a knowledgeable person, or fuqahā, failing which the normal rules of qiyās would be preferred.
When the Āḥād ḥadith has met all of these requirements, action upon it becomes obligatory even if all doubt as to its authenticity is not eliminated. This is because probability (ṣānī) is acceptable as a basis of action in the practical rulings of Shari'ā. But it is generally agreed that in the matter of belief and 'aqidah where decisive evidence is normally required the Āḥād does not constitute a proof on its own.

As noted earlier, when a ḥadith is transmitted by a group of narrators and their reports have become widely known during the first three generations of the advent of ḥadith, it is known as Mashhūr. A Mashhūr hadith often begins as an Āḥād in the first link and then becomes well-known afterwards. It thus appears that the Sahīh hadith can be a Mutawātir, Mashhūr or Āḥād. A Mutawātir is unlikely to be other than Sahīh, but there are examples of Mashhūr ḥadith that have become widely known and yet they do not appear in the Sahīh collections.
THE basic idea of mutābi' and shāhid is to follow-up and confirm a hadith which is narrated by only one transmitter in a single chain of isnād. The purpose is to find out whether additional support can be found for it by tracing its chain of transmission at various levels all the way back to the level of Companions. Confirmation and follow-up may also be located from similar other aḥādīth that might have been reported through alternative channels. The purpose is to ascertain whether the hadith is credible and whether its transmitter is reliable. The enquiry that occurs here is basically concerned with hadith in the category of al-Fārd, that is, hadith which is narrated only by a single narrator throughout its chain of isnād. When this kind of hadith is encountered in the sphere especially of legal rulings (ahkām), confirmation is often sought and the search that is undertaken as a result is governed by the rules of “confirmation and follow-up”.

When the report of one narrator is confirmed by another, and the latter agrees with the former entirely through the same chain of transmission without any change in the hadith, the original narrator (and his hadith) are called mutāba'a (followed), and the new narrator (and his hadith) as mutābi' (follower). The process here is known as mutāba'a. But when confirmation for a hadith is found through an entirely different isnād, from a different Companion, that is, but the hadith conveys the same meaning or a closely similar meaning, the lowest narrator in the chain of isnād (and his hadith) is called shāhid (witness). The process is still known as mutāba'a.
An illustration of mutāba‘a that appears in Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ is as follows: Supposing Ḥammād b. Salama narrated a hadith from Ayyūb, from Ibn Sirīn, from Abū Hurayra, from the Prophet. The hadith is found to be somewhat doubtful and needs to be confirmed. Firstly we look if any other reliable narrator, that is, other than Ḥammād, has narrated the same hadith from Ayyūb. The search here may take the researcher to the six collections and the Muwatta‘ etc. If someone else is found to have also transmitted the same hadith from Ayyūb then a confirmation is found, and this is known as a complete follow-up (mutāba‘a tāmma). But if no one other than Ḥammād is found to have transmitted the same hadith from Ayyūb, then one looks one level up to find if anyone other than Ayyūb might have reported it from Ibn Sirīn. If a confirmation is found at this level, it would be less than complete as it does not descend all the way down but is located at a higher level, which is why it is called a deficient follow-up, or mutāba‘a nāqiṣa. But if the follow-up is unsuccessful at the level of Ayyūb, then one tries to ascertain whether anyone other than Ibn Sirīn might have reported the same hadith from Abū Hurayra, and if such a confirmation is found, it would still be known as a deficient follow-up. And lastly the search may be taken up to the highest level to find out whether any other Companion, that is other than Abū Hurayra, might have reported the same hadith from the Prophet. This too falls under mutāba‘a nāqiṣa.

Shāhid (lit. witness) is sometimes used interchangeably with mutāba‘a but it is different to mutāba‘a in one respect, which is that if the follow-up backwards succeeds only in finding another hadith which is found at any level of the enquiry, it would be called shāhid, which is the second best form of confirmation for the hadith at issue.

There may be instances where all the three types of mutāba‘a combine together in respect of the one and same hadith. An example of this is the hadith which Imām Shāfi‘ī has narrated in Kitāb al-Umm from his teacher Imām Mālik, from ʿAbd Allāh b. Dīnār, from ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿUmar that the Prophet, peace be on him, said:

A month is twenty-nine days. So do not start fasting until you see the new moon (for Ramadan) and do not end the fast until you see the new moon (for Shawwal). But if it became invisible to you then complete fasting for thirty days.

This hadith with its particular wording was somehow thought to be in need of confirmation as al-Shafi‘i seemed to have been the only person to have narrated it from Imam Malik, and it was consequently counted as one of the oddities (al-gharib) of al-Shafi‘i. The reason for this was that the disciples of Imam Malik had narrated this hadith with the same isnād, however, with the phrase “... if it became invisible to you, then measure it (by counting)” (fā-in ghamma ‘alaykum fā‘gdirī lahu). But then a follow-up for al-Shafi‘i’s hadith was found as ‘Abd Allāh b. Maslama al-Qa‘īnābī had also reported it from Imam Malik and it was recorded by al-Bukhārī. This was a complete follow-up, or mutāba‘a tāmma.

An incomplete follow-up (mutāba‘a nāqiṣa) for the same hadith was also found in the Sahih of Ibn Khuzayma wherein one ‘Āsim b. Muhammad had narrated it from his father Muḥammad b. Zayd from his grandfather ‘Abd Allāh b. ‘Umar. Someone else had, in other words, reported the hadith from the same Companion, but the hadith ended with the phrase “… then complete thirty days – fā-akmilu thalāthīn”. This hadith was also recorded in Sahih Muslim from ‘Ubayd Allāh b. ‘Umar, from Nāfi‘, from Ibn ‘Umar with the last phrase being “measure (by counting) upto thirty days” (fā‘gdirū thalāthīn). Now we had in effect two incomplete follow-ups.

Then a similar hadith in the nature of a shāhid was found in al-Nasā‘i from Muḥammad b. Ḥunayn from ‘Abd Allāh b. ‘Abbās, from the Prophet and it conveyed the same meaning as the one that was initially reported by ‘Abd Allāh b. Dīnār from ‘Abd Allāh b. ‘Umar. Al-Bukhārī had also recorded a closely resembling hadith from Muḥammad b. Ziyād from Abū Hurayra with the latter part being worded: “… If it (the moon) became invisible to you then complete by counting thirty days for Sha‘bān (i.e. the preceding month to Ramadān)” (fā-in ghamma ‘alaykum fā-akmilu ‘iddata. Sha‘bān thalāthīn). This is considered to be a shāhid in that it conveys a similar meaning, although in slightly different words to the original ḥadīth that was reported by al-Shāfiʿī. The original ḥadīth thus mentioned that the fasting month may be twenty-nine days, i.e. you can sight the moon to confirm it, but if you are unable to do so then count up to thirty days, both for the previous month and for Ramadān itself.

Another example of confirmation is the ḥadīth narrated by Sufyān b. ‘Uyayna from ‘Amr b. Dinār, from ‘Aṭā b. ‘Abī Rabāḥ, from Ibn ‘Abbās that the Prophet, peace be on him, said with regard to the tanning of hides “If the hides of (animals) are taken and tanned, you may benefit by them”.

A similar hadith was reported by Ibn Jurayj from ‘Amr b. Dinār from ‘Aṭā without, however, mentioning the word ‘tanning’. The ḥadīth simply validated taking benefit from animal skins. Confirmation was obviously needed here to verify one or the other of the two aḥādīth. Then upon enquiry al-Ḥāfīẓ Aḥmad al-Bayhaqī found such confirmation, when it was noted that Usāma b. Zayd had also narrated a ḥadīth with a similar meaning from ‘Aṭā from Ibn ‘Abbās, that the Prophet, peace be on him, said, “Did you not take off its skin, tan it and benefit by it?”

This was a mutāba’a in which Usāma b. Zayd followed and confirmed Sufyān b. ‘Uyayna. The confirmation was complete in that Usāma was located at the same level in the chain of isnād as that of Sufyān. It was basically the same ḥadīth and the word ‘tanning’ occurred in both, even though the grammatical forms of words were slightly different. Then a shāhid was also found for the same ḥadīth through a report by ‘Abd al-Rahmān b. Wa’lā from Ibn ‘Abbās that the Prophet, peace be on him, said “When a hide is tanned it becomes clean.”

This is a shāhid in that the wording of this ḥadīth is different and so is its chain of isnād, but it is still a shāhid in the sense of conveying the same message as the original ḥadīth of Sufyān.
In the event where the search for confirmation is unsuccessful and nothing either identical or similar is found to support the ḥadīth at issue, then a note is usually added such as “Ibn Sirīn alone has reported it from Ābū Hurayra” (tafarrada bihi Ibn Sirīn ‘an Ābī Hurayra,” or that “Ayyūb alone has narrated it from Ibn Sirīn,” so as to show that the ḥadīth is not supported by any other report. When this is the case, then two possibilities tend to arise: either that the message of the ḥadīth stands alone and it is divergent from what is narrated by other more reliable sources, in which case it will be labelled as odd/strange (shādhik) and rejected, or that the basic message of the ḥadīth, which is narrated by a reliable person, is not in disharmony with a divergent ḥadīth that is narrated by someone more reliable, then it would be known as accepted (Maqīb). The opposite of the odd/shādhik ḥadīth that is consequently upheld is known as retained (Maḥfūz).

It may be noted here in passing that in the search for mutāha‘a or confirmation in order to locate a mutābi‘ or a shāhid, a weak or Da‘īf ḥadīth, which is not, however, a forgery nor totally discredited, may be taken into account. This is because confirmation here does not provide original information on ḥadīth, but something to reiterate or endorse an existing ḥadīth. More information on this and on distinguishing a relatively weak from a totally weak and discredited ḥadīth is found in the context of impugnment and validation (al-jarḥ wa‘l-ta‘dīl), which is the subject of a previous chapter of this work. Attention would in that context be paid to points of strength or weakness in both the wording of the ḥadīth as well as its chain of transmission and a detailed enquiry may follow as a result.
Prerequisites of Authenticity

A Sahih (sound/authentic) hadith basically means that it consists of words that the Prophet Muhammad has truly said, and if it describes an action of the Prophet or a tacit approval on his part, that he actually did what is reported. To prove the authenticity of a hadith is thus largely a question of establishing that it has been accurately and reliably transmitted and recorded.

The 'ulamā' of ḥadīth and jurisprudence have laid down a variety of conditions for the authentication of ḥadīth, which may be summarised as follows:

1. The ḥadīth must be accompanied by an isnād in which the transmitter has given the name of the authority from whom he learned the ḥadīth; and that authority must give the name of his source or teacher from whom he received the same ḥadīth, and so on until it reaches the Prophet. This chain of transmitters constitutes the isnād, or sanad (support), simply because the authenticity of the ḥadīth rests on it.

There is some disagreement as to determining the origins of isnād. Some have said that isnād first appeared toward the end of the first century hijra while others have suggested the middle of that century as the starting point of isnād. The rudiments of isnād might have even started during the lifetime of the Prophet, but in this period, the need for isnād was naturally not very stressing. The civil war (fitna) that followed the assassination of the Caliph ʿUthmān is often seen as the main cause that prompted the development of isnād. This would confirm that ḳāmī began during the time of the Companions. In this regard Muhammad Ibn Shīrīn (d. 110) is quoted to have said that “no one asked about ḳāmī before, but when the fitna broke out, they would say, name to us your men.”

It is a familiar feature of ḳāmī that the names and number of transmitters therein increase in every successive generation. Sometimes a hadith transmitted by one Companion is then transmitted by a number of persons in the next generation, who may happen to be residing in different localities. This gave rise to the question of how the particular transmitter obtained the information from his immediate source. Was it through direct hearing and personal contact or in some other way? The ‘ulamā’ of hadith have identified the various ways in which hadith is obtained from the source and then transmitted and delivered to the next link in the ḳāmī, a subject that I have reviewed in chapter two of this work.

The number of transmitters in the ḳāmī largely depends on the intervening period of time between the demise of the Prophet and the date of the compilation of ḥadīth, which could be as few as one or two, or as many as half a dozen or more. Some aḥādīth were compiled fairly early. Hammām Ibn Munabbih, for instance, recorded his Saḥīfa around the year 50 AH, and reported hadith on the authority of Abū Hurayra who related it from the Prophet. Here the ḳāmī consists of one link, a Companion. Imām Mālik (d. 179 AH) related in his Al-Muwatta‘ aḥādīth on the authority of his teacher, Nāfi’, who related, in turn, from ‘Abd Allāh Ibn ‘Umar, who was a Companion relating directly from the Prophet. In this ḳāmī, there are two intervening links in the ḳāmī. The best ḳāmī of Abū Hurayra is that of Ibn Shīhāb al-Zuhri, from Sa‘īd b. al-Musayyib from Abū Hurayra, which also consists of three links. Two other chains of transmitters that are recorded concerning Abū Hurayra, both described as aṣāḥh al-ṣāḥīḥ are: Abū al-Zanād, from al-A’raj, from Abū Hurayra, and the other is Yaḥyā Ibn Abī Kathīr from Abū Salama from Abū Hurayra. Having recorded this al-Ḥākim al-Nisābūrī then commented that identifying a certain ḳāmī as the best or most reliable ḳāmī, or a Golden Chain (silisilat al-dhabab), etc., is largely a matter of personal assessment and ijtihād and the ‘ulamā’ have differed in their assessments. Then al-Nisābūrī goes on to identify some of these himself. The best ḳāmī concerning Abū Bakr al-Šiddiq is thus Ismāʿīl Ibn Abī Khālid, from Qays Ibn Abī Ḥāzim, from Abū Bakr, and the best isnād concerning ʿUmar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb is al-Zuhri, from Sālim, from his father ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿUmar, from ʿUmar. The best isnād concerning ʿĀʾisha is ʿUbayd Allāh b. ʿUmar from al-Qāsim Muḥammad b. Abū Bakr from ʿĀʾisha. Al-Nisābūrī has also listed the best-known isnāds concerning the various regions including Makka, Yemen, Egypt, al-Shām (Syria) and Khurāsān. Imām Shāfiʿī has related ḥadīth on the authority of Imām Mālik, and Imām Ahmad b. Ḥanbal related from Imām Shāfiʿī.

In this chain, which is often referred to as the Golden Chain, all the links were not only renowned scholars and ‘ulamāʾ but also students and contemporaries of one another. As will be noted, most of the isnāds that are known as ʿasārīh al-asānīd consist of two intervening links. Two other similarly short isnāds are those of Muḥammad b. Sirīn – ʿUbayda b. ʿAmr – ʿAli b. Abī Tālīb; and Ibrāhīm al-Nakhaʾī – ʿAlqama b. Qays – ʿAbd Allāh b. Masʿūd. Isnāds which consist of only three links are known as al-thulāṭiyāt, and these have sometimes been placed in separate collections. Ibn Ḥajar al-ʿAsqalānī has thus compiled a volume entitled Thulāṭiyāt al-Bukhārī, and al-Safārīnī has compiled a similar collection concerning the Musnad of Ibn Ḥanbal bearing the title Thulāṭiyāt Ahmad b. Ḥanbal. Isnād that consists of fewer links, known as al-insād al-ʿāli, or upper isnād, is considered more reliable as the possibility of error and doubt increases with every additional link in the chain of isnād. To search for a shorter isnād in preference to one that is lower is an act of merit and highly recommended.

As noted above, from the viewpoint of its proximity or otherwise to the Prophet, isnād is divided into two types, namely elevated isnād (al-insād al-ʿāli) which consists of fewer links and transmitters, and descended isnād (al-insād al-nāzil) which involves a larger number of links and transmitters. The former travels vertically down from a Companion to a Follower, then to a Successor and so on, not necessarily one person at each level, but there is no horizontal movement within the same generation or ʿaṣbaqa. The descended isnād on the other hand contains more than one person sometimes reporting horizontally from one another before it moves downwards.

Proximity in isnād that is desirable must at all times mean proximity to the Prophet through a clean isnād that is devoid of weakness (insād nazīf ghayr da’īf). “Closeness of isnād indicates closeness to the Prophet. To be close to the Prophet means closeness to God Most High.” The second best step to take along this route is to find the closest isnād to one of the recognised Imāms of ḥadith such as Imāms Mālik, al-Thawri and al-Shāfi‘i, whose knowledge and trustworthiness is beyond reproach. Next in this order comes the Sahihayn, that is al-Bukhāri and Muslim, and the effort to find an elevated isnād that involves short and direct transmission from one of the teachers of al-Bukhāri or Muslim that involves the least number of intervening links. This also applies to other recognised and reliable collections of ḥadith. So also is the effort to cut down on the time lag between the transmitters. If the time lag between the two levels or tabaqat is say fifty years, then an alternative isnād that shows this lag at thirty or forty years should be preferred. Lastly, to ascertain an elevated isnād, one also needs to look into the method of transmission and delivery between the various levels, and direct hearing (samā‘) is naturally preferable to other methods. This would mean that one has tried not only to reduce the number of intervening links but also the overall time lag from the beginning to the end of the isnād. The chain of transmitters in most of the ahādīth that are recorded in the Six Major Collections (al-Sīhah al-Sittah) consists, more or less, of four to six links, including the Companion who witnessed the ḥadith. Many prominent ulama’ have gone on record to say that since isnād is the conveyer and vehicle of the Sunna of the Prophet, it is a part of religion, and that diligent and conscientious rendering of isnād is an act of merit and a means to gaining the pleasure of God Most High.

The isnād must be continuous and uninterrupted. A hadith with a broken isnād does not qualify as a Sahih hadith. If the missing link is a Companion who is supposed to have received the ḥadith in the first place and his name is not mentioned, the ḥadith is then called mursal. Mursal is defined as a “hadith transmitted by a Follower (tabi‘i), who has not met with the Prophet and yet has quoted the ḥadith directly from the Prophet.” If the missing link is below the level of the Companion, that is, somewhere in the middle of the chain of isnād, the ḥadith is called munga‘ti‘ (severed or broken). However, if the missing link is lower down at the very end, it is called mu‘allaq (suspended). And then if more than one link is missing in the isnād, it is called mu‘dal. All of these are grouped under Da‘if (weak) and Mardūd (rejected) categories.
and they are not supposed to be included in either Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī or in Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim. However, if the missing link in Munqatī becomes known through another isnād and the necessary clarification is provided, the Munqatī may be accepted and acting upon it would be valid.

One of al-Bukhārī’s pre-conditions of a Ṣaḥīḥ hadith, which distinguishes his collection from that of Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim, was that al-Bukhārī only recorded hadith in which the transmitter of hadith had met with his immediate source. This has actually meant two conditions, one of which was that the two were contemporary, and the other that they actually met one another. Imam Muslim has only insisted on the first but not on the second of these conditions. It is suggested, however, that Muslim’s condition often, if not always, fulfils that of al-Bukhārī, simply because a reliable narrator will normally not report a hadith without verifying it with his source and would not, as it were, report through hearsay evidence.

Imam Muslim has categorically said that “Mursal is the type of hadith which is not a proof (laya bi-ḥijja) neither in our view nor in the view of the learned scholars of hadith”. The Munawwī of Imam Malik, however, contains numerous mursal aḥādīth and it is also found in other works of hadith. There are exclusive collections of the mursal hadith, such as the Kitāb al-Marāṣil by Abū Dāwūd (d. 275 H) which has isolated the mursal from other aḥādīth. Another work to mention is the Marāṣil of Ibn Abī Ḥātim al-Rāzī (d. 277 H) which focuses on the chains of transmission (al-asānīd) of the mursal variety.

Most of the mursal that originate in Madīna is transmitted by Sa’īd b. al-Musayyib (d. 99 H) and these are considered to be generally sound as Ibn al-Musayyib was the son of a prominent Companion, Musayyib Ibn Ḥuzn, who accompanied the Prophet on many important occasions. Sa’īd b. al-Musayyib’s credentials also stand out for the fact that he met the leading Companions including ‘Umar, ‘Uthmān, ‘Alī, Taḥla and Zubayr, and he was also one of the seven outstanding jurists and Mufassīs of Madīna. The ‘ulamā’ of hadith have considered the Mursal of Ibn al-Musayyib as the best of all mursal (aṣaḥīḥ al-marāṣil).

2. Every link in the chain of isnād must be known to be an upright person (‘adil) at the time of reporting the hadith. The minimum requirement of ‘adil is that the person has not committed a major sin/crime and has not persisted in committing minor ones, nor is he known for committing degrading profanities such as association with persons of ill-repute and indulgence in humiliating jokes. Although the 'ulamā’ are unanimous on the requirement of 'adāla, they have differed somewhat on what it precisely means. 'Adāla is often associated with piety and decorum (mura’ā). An 'adl person, according to al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādi, is one “who is known for his performance of obligatory religious duties, observance of what is prohibited, diligence in pursuit of righteousness in his conduct and in dealings with others, discipline in speech, and truthfulness”. Yet al-Baghdādi has also noted that 'adāla is something more than a simple exhibition of piety, and can only be known by consistent information concerning the conduct and activities of a person.¹¹ The sum total of 'adāla is reflected in the confidence that is inspired by it in a particular individual. It is generally held that no one can be free of all sin or of some neglect in the performance of duties. A competent person who is known to be assiduous in the fulfilment of obligations, avoids prohibitions, and has integrity of character in speech and in conduct is presumed to be ‘adl.¹²

The 'adāla of a transmitter must be established by positive evidence. When there is no evidence available as to the 'adāla of a transmitter, his report is unacceptable. Similarly, a report by an anonymous person (riwāyat al-majhūl) such as when the isnād reads in part that “a man reported such and such” is unacceptable. Ignorance of a person's character may be inclusive of both the apparent and hidden (zāhir ma bāṭin) aspects of personality, in which case his report is unacceptable and there is general consensus on this. A person may on the other hand be known for what is apparent in him but unknown for his inner qualities. This is known as al-mastūr (concealed) and there is disagreement as to whether hadith transmitted by a mastūr is admissible. Some have expressed doubt but the Shāfī’is, Ḥanafīs and many others have held that report by a mastūr is acceptable as in the matter of hadith transmission it is preferable to proceed from the position of optimism (husn al-zanna) on the reliability of the transmitter. It is also difficult to verify the inner 'adāla of a person and knowledge of the manifest aspect of one's character is therefore sufficient to make one's report admissible. This concession is not extended, however, to witnesses in judicial disputes as it is possible for the judge to verify the inner aspects of ʿadāla as well as the apparent manifestations thereof. Al-Khaṭṭīb al-Baghdādī has to this effect quoted a ḥadīth on the authority of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib that “a Muslim who deals with people justly and speaks to them while avoiding telling a lie and fulfils promises he makes, has accomplished just character and murūʿa; backbiting him is forbidden and fraternising him a requirement”.¹⁴

Al-Khaṭṭīb al-Baghdādī has stated that a majhūl according to the traditionists (ahl al-ḥadīth) is one who is unknown to the ʿulamāʾ of ḥadīth and his report is not recognised by anyone other than a single narrator. Examples of this are ʿAmr dhū Murr, Jabbār al-Ṭāʾi, and Saʿīd b. Dhī Huddān from whom no one other than Abū Ishāq al-Subayʿī has transmitted any ḥadīth. Similarly Jurayd b. Kulayb is a majhūl as no one other than Qatāḍa b. Diʿāma has transmitted any ḥadīth from him. Al-Baghdādī has added that ignorance (jāhala) is removed if two knowledgeable persons have transmitted ḥadīth from a particular narrator. This removes the jāhala but does not necessarily establish the ʿadāla of the narrator in question. For ʿadāla is established by means of explicit affirmation of uprightness and not merely by means of identification.¹⁵

The ʿadāla of a narrator may be established by various means, including validation (taʿādil),¹⁶ that is, when at least one upright and knowledgeable person, and according to some jurists, two such persons, confirm it, or when the transmitter is known to have been admitted as a witness in the court, or when a learned scholar has relied on his report. But there must be positive evidence that the scholar did not do so for any particular reason, fear or favour, that might compromise the reliability of his position. It has been further suggested that the scholar in question must be known to have accepted the reports only of upright narrators.¹⁷

The qualification of ʿadāla is established for all the Companions of the Prophet regardless of their juristic or political views. This conclusion is based on the Qurʾān, which declares in a reference to the Companions that “God is well-pleased with them, as they are pleased with Him” (al-Tawba, 9:100). This is supported by a number of aḥādīth in which the Prophet has also spoken highly of his Companions, both in general terms and also by reference to particular individuals among them.¹⁸
A person’s reputation for being upright and trustworthy also serves as a proof of his ‘adāla. According to some ‘ulamā’ of ḥadith, such a reputation is even more credible than confirmation by one or two individuals. With regard to certain figures, such as Imām Mālik, Imām Ahmad b. Ḥanbal, al-Awzā’ī, Sufyān al-Thawrī, Sufyān b. ‘Uyayna, al-Layth b. Sa’d, ‘Ali b. al-Madini, Yahyā b. Ma’in, etc., their reputation for ‘adāla is proof above the technicalities of ta’dīl. It is reported that Imām Ahmad b. Ḥanbal was once asked concerning Ishāq b. Rahawayh and his response was “The like of Ishāq – you ask me about him?” A similar response has been recorded from Yahyā b. Ma’in who was asked concerning Abū ‘Ubayd al-Qāsim b. Sallām and he replied “you ask me concerning Abū ‘Ubayd?” A person’s reputation for corruption is also admitted as evidence to impugn his ‘adāla. In the event of conflicting information concerning the ‘adāla of a narrator, the majority maintain that he or she is disqualified.19

The requirement of ‘adāla applies to all varieties of ḥadith, especially the solitary or Āḥād ḥadith, which is reported usually by one or a few individuals. Only with regard to the Mutawātir ḥadith which is proven by the report of a large number of individuals, the requirement of ‘adāla is not emphasised as much as in the case of Āḥād ḥadith.

To ascertain the reliability of narrators of ḥadith, the ‘ulamā’ of ḥadith have compiled biographical data, on a massive scale, of the transmitters of ḥadith, giving the place and date of the person’s birth, his family connections, education and names of his teachers and students, his profession and financial condition and the date of his death. The biographical literature, especially relating to the tārikh al-rumāt and tābaqāt contains useful information and assessment of the degree of reliability of narrators, and a special terminology has been developed for this purpose, as I have already elaborated in chapter five.20

Murū’a is a difficult word to translate but generally it implies decorum, integrity and qualities that are associated with a ‘gentleman’. In the textbooks on ḥadith murū’a often features side by side with piety in the definition of ‘adāla. In the usage of Arabs, murū’a is associated with manliness and courage as well as avoidance of demeaning behaviour that compromises personal honour and is socially humiliating. The works of ḥadīth and ḥadīth also mention avoidance of profanities such as urinating in a standing posture (one may now add, perhaps in a wrong place), stealing a slice of bread, association with lowly characters, even eating in public thoroughfares and walking bare headed. The correct position on this, however, refers such matters to the prevailing custom. Many of the things that were associated with murū'a in the past have evidently changed and current custom seems to have attributed certain other things with social decorum and murū'a. One who throws away litter carelessly in public places, or wears trendy clothes that are not appropriate with one's standing or circumstance, or one who spoils library books that one borrows, and the like, may now be seen to be more relevant to integrity and murū'a. A ḥadīth transmitter must possess murū'a as a part of his probity and 'adāla but what murū'a actually means is often determined by reference to the prevailing custom.

There is a difference between the 'adāla of a witness and of a ḥadīth transmitter in that some of the requirements in the former do not apply to the latter. The question of gender, whether male or female, that is relevant to testimony is not relevant to the narration of ḥadīth, nor is slavery of any relevance nowadays. A blind person is not qualified to be a witness but he or she is qualified to be a narrator of ḥadīth. Even a person who is punished for slander (qadhīf) and is consequently disqualified to be a witness is still held to be qualified to transmit ḥadīth, according to the majority, excepting the Hanafīs, after repentance and show of remorse over his past behaviour.²¹

The 'adāla of a person is, in principle, deemed to be monolithic and unchangeable, according to the majority, and it is, as such, not amenable to increase or decrease. It is also deemed to be indivisible in that a person either possesses it or not, and cannot therefore be said to be partially upright. 'Adāla in this sense resembles the faith (īmān) which is also said to be monolithic and unchangeable.²² The correct view, however, is that 'adāla, like faith and retentiveness of memory, is capable of increase and decrease, although the pace and frequency of change therein is not expected to be either rapid or frequent. Minor changes in experience and outlook do not necessarily affect the attribute of 'adāla, yet a succession of such changes or drastic turn of events may well lead to a significant change in the reliability and 'adāla of a person. Yet for purposes of hadith narration, it is the undiminished 'adāla which qualifies a person to narrate hadith, and not any reduced or compromised version thereof. The 'ulama' of hadith have thus maintained that a narrator of hadith must be clear both of major defects of character as well as persistently recurring minor ones that compromise one's integrity and murū'a.23

As for the narration of one who is charged with pernicious innovation (bid'ah) and propagation of dubious doctrines that are contrary to valid precedent, the 'ulama' have held two different views. Many leading 'ulama', including Imām Mālik, have held that narration of an agent of bid'ah (mubtadi') is unacceptable absolutely regardless of the nature of his bid'ah. The second view on this is one of stipulated acceptance, as it reflects on the nature of the bid'ah. This may either be such that invokes infidelity (kufr) on its propagator, in which case he is disqualified and there is general agreement on this – and it was on this basis that the heretics known as al-Zanādiqa were disqualified. A mere accusation of kufr or bid'ah amounting to kufr by one's opponents is not enough to disqualify the mubtadi', as many opposing factions in history have actually accused one another of bid'ah and kufr. One must, in other words, determine the nature of bid'ah amounting to kufr on the basis of objective evidence. The bid'ah that disqualifies a narrator of hadith must be such that denies an essential aspect of Islam and its Shari'ah or a principle that is established as an essential part of the religion – such as denial of one of the five pillars of the faith, or denial of an attribute of God Most High that is clearly conveyed in the Qur'an.24

In the case of bid'ah of a lower order, if the mubtadi' has gone so far as to advocate a lie in order to promote his doctrine, and has invited others to embrace it, he is disqualified. Sufyān al-Thawrī is quoted as having said that he would admit the testimony of the agents of caprice (ahl al-ahmā') when they are upright 'adāl in other respects, that is, in matters other than their own doctrines. Imām Shāfi'i has similarly stated that a simple advocacy of hawai' and bid'ah is not a disqualification unless it is known that the mubtadi' has advocated a lie. Ibn al-Ṣalāh has noted an additional requirement which is that hadith reported by a mubtadi', who is not inviting others to his bid'ah, must also not endorse the bid'ah he has advocated. If it is relevant to the bid'ah in question, it is unacceptable.24
It is to be noted, however, that the 'ulamāʾ of ḥadith have sometimes qualified as reliable persons those who are accused of deviation and bid‘a, yet truthful enough to be narrators of ḥadith. Abū Dāwūd al-Sijistānī went on record to say that among the deviationists, no other faction has been more truthful in the narration of ḥadith than the Kharijites. It is further noted that al-Bukhārī has relied on the narration of one ʿImrān
b. Ḥattān who was a confirmed deviationist, and also that Yahyā b.
Maʿīn and Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal validated one ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Himmānī (d. 202) who was an active propagator of irjāʾ and murjiʿa (the belief that a grave sin does not necessarily amount to kufr and that the hope (irjāʾ) for forgiveness from God still remains valid).
It is noted in this context that these great Imāms validated the ḥadith of the individuals concerned on the basis of the personal knowledge of their character, which is the correct approach, unlike the approach that focuses on the narrator’s association with a sect, faction or group often in disregard of the person’s character as such. Al-Baghdādī has further noted that the Companions and the Followers have accepted report and testimony of the Kharijites especially those whom they considered to be trustworthy and pious. They have accepted narration, for example, from ʿImrān b. Ḥāṭṭān who was a Kharijite and from Ibn Abī Najīḥ who was a Muʿtazilī and from numerous other individuals who were associated with Qadariyya, the Shiʿites and Murjiʿa. It thus became well-known and consensus is established to the effect that personal character rather than association with a sect or faction is the determining factor of a person’s probity and ʿadāla.a

The majority of the 'ulamāʾ of ḥadith have held that a muḥtaḍī is not disqualified and ḥadith may be transmitted from him, if he is clear of kufr and knowingly advocating a lie, whether or not he is actively engaged in propagating bid‘a. Some have stipulated that he is qualified only if he has restrained himself from actively inviting others to his bid‘a.b One who has lied in his dealings with the people but is known to have subsequently repented and corrected himself is not disqualified, but he is disqualified regardless of repentance, if he has attributed a lie to the Prophet.c

3. None of the narrators in the isnād is known to be implicated in forgery, sectarian, political and theological disputes. A ḥadith is therefore suspect if it smacks of scholastic fanaticism or when it advocates a particular dogma and doctrine. The report for example that “There will be a man in my umma by the name of Muhammad b. Idris (al-Shāfi‘ī) who will be more harmful to my umma than the devil (iblīs), and there will be a man in my umma by the name Abū Ḥanīfa who will be the shining light (ṣirāj) of my community”. There are numerous similar reports concerning ‘Alī and Mu‘āwiya, one of which simply has it “When you see Mu‘āwiya on my pulpit, kill him”. In yet another report it is stated “Whoever says that the Qur’ān is the created speech of God becomes an infidel and his wife stands divorced from him as of that moment”. All of these evidently indulge in corruption and crude fanaticism, and the ‘ulamā’ have isolated them in their works under the general heading of Mawdu‘āt (forgeries). 29

4. As noted above, the narrator of ḥadith must be a contemporary of the teacher on whose authority he relates the ḥadith. This means that he must have been born before the death of his teacher by a period long enough to enable him to acquire the knowledge of hadith. Al-Bukhārī has further stipulated that there must be evidence to show that the narrator has met with his immediate source. It is consequently taken as a sign of forgery when a narrator reports a ḥadith directly from his teacher and there is evidence to show that the former was born long after the latter’s demise, or that the two never entered the same locality. 30 Both the teacher and disciple must be fit for delivery and reception of hadith and neither is too forgetful, confused or disabled nor suffers from defects that render his ‘adāla and retentiveness questionable.

The ‘ulamā’ on the whole do not require evidence of actual encounter between teacher and disciple and take it for granted that words such as “I heard – samī‘tu”, or “so and so spoke to me – haddathāna” actually mean that the two have met. They are thus content with the possibility of a meeting and do not require actual proof. This is the position of Imām Muslim. But al-Bukhārī required evidence of an actual meeting, where, when and for how long, etc., was the Shaykh teaching in a madrasa or a mosque when the disciple met him – or any other such information to show actual encounter between the narrator and his immediate source.
5. The narrator of hadith must possess a retentive memory so that his report can be trusted. If he is known for committing frequent errors and inconsistencies, his report would be unacceptable. The faculty of retention (da'bit) is the ability of a person to listen to an utterance, to comprehend its meaning as it was originally intended, and then to retain it and take all necessary precautions to safeguard its accuracy. In cases of doubt in the retentiveness of a transmitter, if his report can be confirmed by comparison to the recognised works of authority on the subject, or by the action of his predecessors, it may be accepted. If someone has suffered weakness of memory due to illness or old age, only hadith that he related prior to that event can be accepted. But in the absence of any verification, reports by persons who are totally obscure and whose retentiveness cannot be established are unacceptable. The retentive faculty of a narrator is established through his work or when a number of upright and trustworthy transmitters are known to have relied on his reports and have used it as evidence/reference in their own work.31

A narrator's forgetfulness does not necessarily invalidate his hadith according to the majority of jurists and hadith experts, except for the Ḥanafis who maintain that hadith is invalidated if the narrator cannot confirm nor recognise what he had narrated. Thus the Ḥanafis rejected the hadith of Sulaymān b. Mūsā from al-Zuhrī from ʿUrwa from ʿĀ'isha from the Prophet that “When a woman is married without the permission of her guardian, her marriage is null and void.”

This is because of what Ibn Jurayj had said that “I met with al-Zuhrī and asked him about this hadith but he did not recognise it”.32 Another example of this is the hadith of Rabīʿat al-Raʿy, from Ṣuhayl b. Abī Śalih from his father from Abū Hurayra that “the Prophet, peace be on him, adjudicated by one witness plus an oath.” ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Muhammad al-Darāwardī then said “I met Ṣuhayl and asked him about it but he did not recognise the hadith.”33

Many of the leading scholars of hadith are known to have forgotten what has been heard from them, but this should not invalidate the original report on account merely of forgetfulness. Humans are prone to forgetfulness and it is due partly to this that many, including Imām Shāhī, have warned against narration from the living.
Retention with the aid of writing is acceptable but it is recommended that the writing is legible and does not omit the dots over or under the letters nor is it turned into abbreviation and sign language that no one other than the writer is able to read. Words and phrases should also not be split between the ending of one and the beginning of a new line so as to prevent distortion.\textsuperscript{34}

One who is known for laxity (al-tasāhul) in the hearing of hadith, such as falling asleep at meetings, or is willing to accept hearsay in ḥadīth, or one who makes frequent errors, fail to qualify as retentive of ḥadīth and their narration is therefore not accepted. Similarly, when the narrator is known to have made an error and this becomes clear to him yet he stubbornly persists in it, his narration is disqualified.

When the requirements of ‘adāla and ḍabī of the narrator are ascertained and established his report becomes acceptable and the possibility of error and doubt in it is considered remote and insignificant, although not impossible. The report is considered to provide a valid basis for action and judgement. ‘Adāla and ḍabī qualify the narrator to transmit hadith that is then relied upon, but the ḥadīth itself must naturally be free of obvious and hidden defects and outlandish contents, or shudhūd. The isnād of ḥadīth must also be free of defects such as broken links, suspension (ta’līq), and ambiguities that are associated with the isnād.\textsuperscript{35}

6. With regard to the text matn of ḥadīth it is noted that it must be in the familiar eloquent and dignified style of the prophetic language. If it is a report of an action of the Prophet, it should be such that can be expected of him. The presence of obscene and objectionable words, and statements that are particularly crude, ridiculous and unbecoming of the Prophet are usually taken as signs of forgery in ḥadīth and rejected. But even more important than words are the meaning and purpose, which is what the ḥadīth critics have pointed out. A certain poverty of style in the standards of expression is not given too much weight as ahādīth are often in the words of the narrators themselves. But if the meaning is corrupt to an extent that it cannot bear harmony with the standards of prophetic speech, it would be taken as a sign of forgery.\textsuperscript{36} The meaning is generally held to be corrupt when it engages in patently unreasonable assertions. Corruption of purpose and meaning is also caused by unwarranted expatriation in the attributes of God Most High, His illustrious self, or negation of those of His attributes which are clearly established in the Qur'ān. Thus the so-called ḥadīth that “I saw my Lord in ‘Arafat riding a red camel,” and the so-called ḥadīth of the Prophet that “I saw my Lord on the Night of Ascension in the heaven with a curtain of fire between us but I saw everything even the crown studded with pearls that He was wearing”. Corruption in purpose is also noted when a so-called ḥadīth violates the basic positions of Shari‘a such as by declaring permissible the lives and properties of people and validating attack on their personal dignity. The Prophet can similarly not be expected to take assertive positions and speak either for or against sectarian movements and factions that never existed in his lifetime nor was the subject of any relevance to his mission and purpose. There is so much forgery on this and similar other themes that are patently corrupt, partisan and incredible.

7. The text and message of the ḥadīth must be consistent with the Qur’ān. Should there be a clear case of conflict in such a way that no reasonable compromise and interpretation can remove it, the ḥadīth is rejected. The so-called ḥadīth, for example, that “The offspring of adultery (zinā) shall not enter Paradise down to seven generations” was rejected by the Prophet’s widow, ‘Ā’isha, as it violated the clear text of the Qur’ān that “No soul shall carry the burden of another soul” (al-An‘ām, 6:164).

Similarly the report that “whoever begets a child and names him Muhammad, he and his offspring shall go to Paradise” is clearly in conflict with the Qur’ānic principle that “Anyone who has done an atom’s weight of good shall see its reward, and anyone who has done an atom’s weight of evil shall see its recompense” (al-Zalzala, 99:7–8).

A clear conflict with the ruling of ijma‘ is also taken as a sign of forgery in ḥadīth. The so-called ḥadīth, for example, that “One who performs the obligatory prayer (salāh) on the last Friday of Ramaḍān would have made up for all the prayers he has missed throughout his life for seventy years” — is contrary to the ruling of ijma‘ that no other form of worship replaces a ṣalāh that has been missed out. And lastly, when a ḥadith conflicts with another well-known hadith that is proven by a superior isnād, it is seen as a sign of forgery. This last instance of conflict is a wider subject that the ‘ulamā’ have looked into under the general heading of Mukhtalif al-Ḥadīth (also known as Mushkil al-Ḥadīth) which is the subject of a separate chapter in this work. This branch of the ḥadīth studies is concerned mainly with discrepancies and conflicts which are, however, reconcilable by recourse to the normal rules of interpretation, and it is in this respect where Mukhtalif al-Ḥadīth differs from the study of abrogation in ḥadīth. This latter branch of the hadith studies, known as al-Nāṣikh wa-l-Mansūkh fitr-Ḥadīth, is on the other hand concerned exclusively with conflicts that cannot be reconciled on grounds of interpretation. Mukhtalif al-Ḥadīth was the subject of a particular work bearing the title Ḥikmat al-Ḥadīth by ʿAbd al-Shafīʿī, who was the first to discuss this subject in the seventh volume of his Kitāb al-ʿUmm. This was followed by Taʿwil Mukhtalif al-Ḥadīth of Ibn Qutayba al-Dānūrī (213–267) and many other contributions ever since. The branch of ḥadīth studies which is concerned with abrogation in ḥadīth stipulate a number of requirements that must be met before abrogation can occur, but this too is the subject of a separate chapter of this book.\(^7\)

8. Ḥadīth which is not historical and fails to qualify the test of historical evidence that was known during the time of the Prophet is rejected. The hadith, for example, reported by Saʿd b. Muʿādh and Muʿāwiya b. Abū Suṭyān that “the Prophet levied the jizya (poll tax) on the Jews of Khaybar and relieved them of hardship” is discredited on account of the historical fact that jizya was not known at that time, that is, the year of Khaybar, and that the Qur'ānic ruling on jizya was only revealed later in the year of Tabūk, and that Saʿd b. Muʿādh had also died before the year of Khaybar. In yet another report, Anas b. Mālik has stated that “I entered the public bath and saw the Messenger of God wearing a wrapper and said: O Anas, I have forbidden entry to a public bath without a wrapper”. The facts of history show on the other hand, that the Prophet did not enter a public bath as they did not exist in Madīna at the time.\(^8\) Some ḥadīth collections have also recorded

9. The text must be in agreement with reason. If it is illogical in purpose and meaning, it is suspected of being a forgery. Anything that is totally superstitious, or in clear conflict with accepted norms, or contradictory in itself or totally incredible vis-à-vis the clear principles of the nuṣāḥ would come under suspicion. The so-called ḥadith, for example, that “the ark of Noah circumambulated the Kaʿba seven times and then prayed two units of prayer at the end,” is evidently irrational and therefore rejected. The report similarly that “God Most High revived from the dead the parents of the Prophet Muḥammad and they embraced Islam in his presence” is evidently unreasonable and contrary to familiar experience. Noted under this category are also ḥadith which contain detailed prophecies of future events with their dates and places of occurrence.

When the ḥadith in question promises a disproportionate reward or warns of an exceedingly severe punishment for a trivial act, it would be suspected of being a forgery. Numerous reports are on record of spurious ḥadith under the general heading of al-targhib maʾl-tarhib (encouragement and warning) that promises, for instance, permanent abode in Paradise for recitation of a verse of the Qurʾān, or for a simple act which may be mandâh (recommendable), or even omitting something in the nature of a makrûh (reprehensible).

10. The narrator must not be totally unknown (maḥfūl). To eliminate obscurity and ignorance, the ‘ulamāʾ of ḥadith stipulate that at least two upright persons should have transmitted ḥadith from the person in question. Only the Companions are exempted from this requirement. Examples of some of the maḥfūl narrators that are given include such names as ʿAmr dhū Murr, Jabbār al-Ṭāʾi and Saʿīd b. Huddān from whom no one else but Abū Ishāq al-Subayʾī has narrated, which means that they are obscure.

Narration by two upright persons is, however, good enough to remove ignorance as to the identity of the person (jahālat al-ṣaym) but it does not establish uprightness (\textit{'adāla}) of the narrator in question. Ḥadīth is not acceptable when it is transmitted by an unknown person.\footnote{1}

\textit{Majhūl} (obscure) is sub-divided into three types, one of which is of unknown identity (\textit{majhūl al-'ayn}). This type of obscurity is removed by narration from the person concerned by two upright persons. If only one person has narrated ḥadīth from him, the obscurity still remains. \textit{Majhūl} to the \textit{ulamā’} of ḥadīth is one from whom no more than one person has reported. Al-Bukhārī and Muslim are noted in this connection for having narrated ḥadīth from Mirdās al-Aslāmī, and Rābī’ā b. Ka’b respectively. These are considered to be \textit{majhūl} as only one person, namely Qays b. Ḥāzim has narrated ḥadīth from the former, and Abū Salama ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf from the latter. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ who initially made this observation was, however, refuted later by al-Nawawī who said that both al-Aslāmī and Ibn Ka’b were Companions and they cannot therefore be classified under the category of \textit{majhūl}.\footnote{2}

The second type of \textit{majhūl} is one who is not known for his uprightness (\textit{'adāla}), and this also occurs in two types, namely one whose \textit{'adāla} is unknown overtly and covertly (\textit{min ḥayth al-zāhir wu'l-bāṭin}), and one who appears to be upright but no insight into his character is available. \textit{'Adāla} in principle requires positive evidence on both of these, but questions tend to arise if a person is only known to be upright in appearance but his true character remains hidden (\textit{mastūr}). There is a difference of opinion as to the admissibility of ḥadīth from the \textit{mastūr}. Many consider it to be admissible as it is often difficult to verify the inner quality of \textit{'adāla} in the individual narrators of ḥadīth. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ has made the observation that works of authority on ḥadīth often accept and record ḥadīth from persons whose inner aspect of \textit{'adāla} remains unknown.\footnote{3}

11. The narrator must also know the conditions of his \textit{shaykh/teacher} and ascertain his knowledge and character and only then should transmit ḥadīth from him. It will be noted in this connection that there is usually a process of selection involved in the teacher-disciple relationship. The \textit{shaykh} of ḥadīth, like the teacher in most other branches of knowledge in the traditional system, selected his disciple on the basis of the latter’s ability and prospects. The disciple too tended to select as to whom he wanted to study with and acquire the knowledge of ḥadīth from; and he consequently investigated the ability and reputation of the individual teachers of ḥadīth. Hence the ṣayykh and his disciple are expected to have known one another and may well have developed a relationship that is taken into account in the context of ḥadīth transmission. The ḥadīth scholars have looked into this from the perspective of the classes of narrators, or ḍabaqāt, which enabled them to assess the extent of the disciple’s closeness with his ṣayykh. The classes or ḍabaqāt that may be reviewed from this perspective are as follows:

a. The first class, or ṣabqa, of narrators comprise those who have maintained a close association and companionship with their ṣayykh.
These are disciples who have kept the company of their ṣayykh in his circles of teaching and during his journeys and both the ṣayykh and disciple are upright and retentive and combine absolutely the best qualities that ḥadīth narrators could be expected to have. An example of this would be the companionship of Nāfi’ with ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿUmar and that of Imām Mālik with al-Zuhri.

b. The second class, or ṣabqa, of narrators comprise those who have kept regular but intermittent company of their ṣayykh that does not altogether amount to discontinuity of contact. They do not maintain the same level of companionship and association with their ṣayykh as those who belong to the first class above. Yet they know their teachers well enough to remain clear of doubt with regard to ḥadīth transmission from them. Examples of this ṣabqa may be seen in the relationship of ʿĀthir b. Abī Rabāh with ʿAbd Allāh Ibn ʿAbbās, and that of Abū ʿAmr al-Awzāʿī with al-Zuhri.

c. The third class of narrators apply to those who have kept as close an association with their teachers as those of the first ṣabqa above but who have not escaped doubt over their character and retentiveness, and their transmission of ḥadīth falls between acceptable and rejectable.
Examples of this ṣabqa are said to include the companionship with
d. The fourth class includes those whose companionship with the shaykh is slight and they have also not escaped doubt over the likelihood of impugnment (al-jarīh). An example of this would be Iḥṣāq b. Yaḥyā al-Kalbī in relationship to al-Zuhrī.

e. The fifth class comprises the weak and the obscure (al-duʿafāʾ waʾl-majhūlin) who occasionally attended the teaching sessions of their teacher but with little regularity and commitment. The ḥadīth that they transmit from their shaykh is on the whole unacceptable and it would be advisable for them not to have attempted it in the first place. Examples of this class in relationship to al-Zuhrī would be ʿAbd al-Quddūs b. Ḥabīb al-Dīmashqī and Muḥammad b. Saʿīd al-Maslūb.

With reference to the bulk of the aḥādīth that al-Bukhārī and Muslim have recorded, it is noted that they qualified the first two of these five classes and only occasionally qualified narrators that fell in the third, but they disqualified the fourth and fifth classes altogether. This is understood from the familiar expression “in accordance with the condition of the two shaykhs – ʿalā sharī al-shaykhayn.”

It may be noted, however, that some ḥadīth transmitters tended to have a weak association with a particular shaykh of ḥadīth but they qualified better with another shaykh. This is taken into account by al-Bukhārī who has disqualified the reports of one Ḥāshīm from al-Zuhrī but has accepted his narration from persons other than al-Zuhrī.44

12. Both the text and isnād of the ḥadīth must be clear of subtle and hidden defects, or ḥilla, and also clear of concealment, tadhīl.45 These two subjects, namely ḥilal al-ḥadīth and tadhīl have been separately addressed and need not therefore be elaborated here.
Conclusion and Reform Proposals

IN my introductory remarks I commented on the strengths and weaknesses of methodology and methodological guidelines that the 'ulamā' have developed for the authentication of hadith. I then expounded in the ensuing chapters the salient features of ġadīth studies, methods of ġadīth criticism, subtle defects in ġadīth and prerequisites of authenticity, all of which are evidently designed to ensure the purity of both the isnād and text of the ġadīth. What I have presented in this book in reality provides only a bird's-eye view account of the painstaking efforts that the 'ulamā' and scholars of ġadīth have taken to verify the authenticity of the ġadīth of the Prophet. The sheer wealth of the scholarly works on ġadīth methodology and sciences and the effort that has gone into the compilation of countless numbers of valuable works on ġadīth spanning the entire history of Islamic scholarship cannot fail to impress. The 'ulamā' have clearly seen the ġadīth studies as an arena where they combined meticulous scholarship with a sacred purpose and the results they have achieved are clearly remarkable. The purpose was to render the ġadīth as accurately as possible. The ġadīth transmitters, compilers and critics “tried to reproduce exactly what they had learnt from their teachers ... They reproduced each word and letter, including the diacritical marks and the vowel points, without deviating in the least from what they had received.” Zubayr Siddiqi who made these observations went on to quote al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī to the effect that the Companion ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿUmar did not like to change the order of words in a sentence even when it did not affect the meaning of the ġadīth in the least. Mālik
b. Anas tried to be exact about each and every letter. Ibn Sîrin did not approve of making corrections in a ḥadîth even in those cases in which there was a clear mistake by the reporter. The entire corpus of 'ulûm al-ḥadîth was geared toward the same purpose. Elaborate methods for cross-examination, double-checking, follow-up and scrutiny of the isnâd and text were developed and employed in order to ensure accuracy in the reception, transmission, and documentation of ḥadîth. The 'ulamâ' of hadîth may be said to have explored and exploited every possible tool and method that could serve and facilitate the integrity and reliability of hadîth. Is there any further room for fresh enquiry and research into the methodology of hadîth? This is a question that comes to mind, and my peremptory answer to it is basically negative. There is clearly little scope for any new methodology or research that would add anything substantial and useful to the work that has already been done by people who were better positioned and qualified for what they attempted and achieved. But is there scope for new measures that the present generation of Muslims could take to enhance the reliability of hadîth? I believe that we do have a rich and resourceful methodology for the authentication of hadîth which goes a long way to achieve its desired purpose. Yet some weakness is noted with regard to its implementation especially in the early stages of the compilation of ḥadîth. The methodology of usûl al-ḥadîth, and even that of usûl al-fiqh, were developed mainly in the third century hijra, and even as late as in the days of Imâm Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal (d. 241 H), questions have been raised whether he had in fact known the methodology of usûl al-ḥadîth in its final form. As indicated in the text of this work, the methodology of hadîth criticism originated in the work of al-Shāfi‘î but hadîth collection had started much earlier. By the time of al-Bukhârî, the broad outline of that methodology was admittedly in place but it was still at its early stages of development. Usûl al-ḥadîth saw its efflorescence in the works of al-Baghdâdî, Ibn al-Ṣalâh, al-Nawawi and al-‘Asqâlânî in the course of the subsequent centuries after al-Bukhârî. It may therefore not come as a surprise to note that both al-Bukhârî and Muslim contain hadîth that were subsequently identified as weak (Da‘îf) or which did not fulfil some of the prerequisites of authenticity for a Ṣaḥîh hadîth.
One tends to notice a certain degree of imbalance in the kind of attention that ḥadith scholars have paid to matters of transmission and isnād as opposed to the text or mutān of ḥadith. Ḥadith experts clearly paid greater attention to the former at the expense, to some extent, of the latter. The accuracy of the ḥadith text and its harmony or otherwise with the Qurʾān and principles of Islam that had a wider basis of support in the ḥadith itself did not receive a commensurate level of attention from the ḥadith scholars. In our discussion of mukhtalif al-ḥadith, which is the subject of an earlier chapter, some examples are given of ḥadith, as some are also given in the following pages, which appear in al-Bukhārī and Muslim, Abū Dāwūd and others. A careful reading of the text, in these examples, reveals weaknesses so much so that the ḥadith in question could hardly be accepted as an authentic saying of the Prophet Muḥammad. One would have expected in such instances that the compiler of such controversial materials would have rejected them and refused to document them in the category of Ṣaḥīḥ ḥadith, or even of any ḥadith for that matter. Weak and even fabricated ḥadith are found in the ḥadith collections, and although not extensive, the presence even on a limited scale, of such controversial ḥadith tends to undermine confidence in the veracity of the larger corpus of ḥadith.

To say that the methodology of ʿusūl al-ḥadīth has not been accurately observed is shown in works such as that of Abūʾl-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzī (d. 597 H) entitled Al-Mawḍūʿāt who identified one ḥadīth in al-Bukhārī, two in Muslim, thirty-three in the Musnad of Imām Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, seven in the Sunan Abū Dāwūd, ten in Sunan al-Nasāʾī, thirty in Sunan Ibn Māja, thirty in Jāmiʿ al-Tirmidhī, and sixty in Mustadrak of al-Hākim as forged aḥādīth. Muṣṭafā al-Sibāʾī who recorded this information added that subsequent scholars especially Ibn Ḥajar al-ʿAsqalānī (d. 852 H) and Jalāl al-Dīn al-Suyūṭī (d. 911 H) followed-up Ibn al-Jawzī’s work and although they disagreed with it in some respects, they nevertheless endorsed most of Ibn al-Jawzī’s conclusions on the presence of weak ḥadith in the standard collections.3

Commenting on the weaknesses of al-Bukhārī, Mustafa Azami had this to say:
Many scholars criticised Bukhārī’s work. The criticism concerns about 80 narrators and some 110 ahādīth. The criticism showed that though these ahādīth were not mistaken or false, yet they did not measure up to the high standard which was set by Bukhārī himself.⁴

Muhammad Zubayr Siddiqi has similarly stated that “In spite of the great care of their compilers, there are still some weak or forged traditions in the standard collections, which have been discussed and criticised by their commentators”.⁵ Siddiqi then commented that “most of the traditions concerning the coming of Dajjāl and the Mahdī, and those concerning Khīḍr in the various collections of ḥadīth are declared by the traditionists as forged ones, and are included in the works on Mawḍūʿāt”.⁶ Siddiqi then went on to give the following examples of questionable ahādīth from al-Bukhārī:

1. The ḥadīth recorded by al-Bukhārī that the Qur’ānic āya (al-Ḥujurāt, 49:9): “And if two parties of the believers fight one another, then make peace between them...” refers to ʿAbd Allāh b. Ubayy and that of the other Companions of the Prophet – has been criticised in that the āya cannot carry this explanation. This is because ʿAbd Allāh b. Ubayy had not accepted Islam even outwardly at the time when this āya was revealed.

2. The ḥadīth recorded with slightly different versions, one of which appears in al-Bukhārī has it that if Ibrāhīm, the Prophet’s son, had lived, he would have been a Prophet. This so-called ḥadīth has been severely criticised by many and Yahyā Ibn ʿAlī al-Shawkānī has isolated it as a forged one.⁷

3. The ḥadīth reported by al-Bukhārī that Adam’s height was sixty yards, has been criticised by Ibn Hajar on the basis of the measurement of the homes and dwellings of some of the ancient nations, which do not show that their inhabitants were enormously tall.⁸ Siddiqi then added (p. 203):

The ahādīth reported by Ibn Māja on the excellence of Qazwīn (his own home town) have been declared by the traditionists as forged ones.
In the very last paragraph of his book, Hadith Literature, Siddiqi wrote that there was enough material available for the “compilation of a standard collection of completely authentic traditions out of the already generally accepted compilations”. This he added was “a tremendous task” but achievable by applying to each hadith the principles that have been laid down and agreed by the great scholars and compilers of hadith themselves.

Fahmi Huwaydi has discussed the views of Jalāl al-Dīn al-Suyūṭī (d. 911/1505) and Ibn Ḥazm (d. 994/1590) concerning the rejectors of Sunna, and the doubts that were expressed, in earlier times, by the heretics (Zanādiqa) and the Kharjītes over the authority of hadith as a source of Shari'a. Both al-Suyūṭī and Ibn Ḥazm resolutely refuted the position that the Qur'ān was the only proof of Shari'a and held that the Sunna itself did not support this position. They also discussed the hadith in which the Prophet has been quoted to have said “whatever hadith that you receive in my name, refer it to the Qur'ān – accept it if it has a basis in the Qur'ān, but reject it otherwise.” Al-Suyūṭī refuted this as a fabrication of the Zanādiqa, which has, however, found support among some Mu'tazili theologians of Baṣra, who held that the Qur'ān explained all things “tihyāna fi kulli shay'. The Kharjītes also denied the authority of a great deal of aḥādīth (as well as that of ijmā') in the sphere of the aḥkām. They have consequently refuted stoning as a punishment for zinā', and wiping over boots (mash ala'l-khuffayn) as these were only validated by the Sunna and did not occur in the Qur'ān.

Huwaydi then quotes the views of Ibn Ḥazm with which he also agrees. The gist of what is said here is that the Qur'ān contains ambiguous rulings which could not be understood without the explanation of the Sunna. The question is thus posed: where does one find in the Qur'ān a reference that the zuhr (early afternoon) prayer is four units, and that the maghrīb (evening) prayer is three? The Qur'ān also does not explain the manner in which certain other rituals of worship are performed. There is also no reference to the quantities of zakāh, or to things that must be avoided in fasting, nor does the Qur'ān expound the details of the law of sale, enforcement of punishments, and so forth. Ibn Ḥazm is then quoted to have added that it is tantamount to disbelief for a Muslim to say that he does not accept anything (i.e. any hukm) unless he finds it in the Qur'ān. Among the extremists were also those who held that there were only two obligatory prayers (morning and evening) instead of the normal five. Ibn Hazm declared that anyone who held such views was a denier of Islam simply because they confined themselves to the apparent text of the Qur'ān and ignored or isolated the Sunna.

Having quoted Ibn Ḥazm, Huwaydī went on to agree with him and add that the Qur'ān itself provided ample evidence in support of the conclusion that the Sunna was a valid source and proof of Shari'ā, and quoted Qur'ānic passages on this in 57:7; 16:44; 4:80 and so forth. Huwaydī also cited in support the renowned scholar of hadith, Muḥammad Nāṣir al-Dīn al-Albānī, who wrote a treatise, entitled Al-Ḥadīth al-Fuṣūl bi-Nafsīhī fī-Al-Aqā'id wa-l-Akhām (Hadīth is a proof by itself on matters of dogma and law), a title which is self-explanatory of its subject matter and purpose.

Two other points Huwaydī makes may briefly be mentioned. He regretted that many unqualified people who were not knowledgeable of the methodology of hadīth have often lightly dismissed hadīth and advanced ill-considered views in the name of ijtihād.

Huwaydī also recommended greater scrutiny in respect of research theses and dissertations that are sometimes accepted and passed by the faculties, even of al-Azhar, which are less than meticulous and on occasions ill-informed as to the correct methodology and procedure of hadīth.

Hadīth critics have expressed reservations, nevertheless, over the authenticity of various aḥādīth. Some politically tendentious aḥādīth have come under criticism. One such hadīth that al-Bukhārī has recorded on the authority of Jābir b. Samura is as follows: “I heard the Prophet, peace be on him, saying that there will be twelve rulers (amīrin),’ and then the Prophet uttered words which I did not hear – but my father believed they were ‘... all of them will be from Quraysh’.”

The Shi'i scholars have taken this hadīth as “decisive evidence”, on the veracity of their belief in the twelve Imāms. The Sunnis themselves have advanced different interpretations of this hadīth. One interpreter thus understood this to mean that the twelve amīrs will be simultaneous, all of whom will be laying claim to leadership, and the context is therefore one of tumult (al-fitna).\textsuperscript{13} The various versions of probably this same ḥadith that Muslim and Abū Dāwūd have recorded say something different. Briefly, Muslim recorded a ḥadith to the effect that “this matter (i.e. the Caliphate) will not go away until twelve Caliphs have come and gone.” Abū Dāwūd similarly recorded a ḥadith to the effect that “this religion shall remain until twelve Caliphs have ruled, all of them with the agreement and support of the umma.” The commentator of al-Bukhārī, Ibn Ḥajar al-‘Asqalānī, has quoted these views, and reading all of them together, he thought that the reference therein was to the Caliphate. But this only added to complication in view of the common knowledge that the approved Caliphs were only four, not twelve. According to Qādī ʿIyād al-Yahsubī the ḥadith “probably meant just leaders (aʾimmati al-ʿadl) of whom four have lived and the rest may emerge any time before the day of resurrection.” This was “just the right sort of interpretation,” according to Jawād Yāsīn, for its Shiʿi readers with which to vindicate their belief in occultation and the return of their twelfth Imām any time before the day of resurrection.\textsuperscript{14}

Ibn al-Jawzī surmised on the meaning of the ḥadith at issue and commented that the Prophet had probably meant twelve rulers excluding his Companions. It was then suggested that the ḥadith had referred to the Umayyad Caliphs. The problem here was that the Umayyad Caliphs, starting from Muʿāwiya (d. 41 H) to Marwān al-Thānī (d. 127 H) numbered fourteen, not twelve. Ibn al-Jawzī’s response to this was that Muʿāwiya may be excluded since he was a Companion. Then he added that Marwān Ibn al-Ḥakam (d. 65 H) should also be excluded as he was a usurper and took office after the people had elected ʿAbd Allāh b. al-Zubayr. This rather imaginative interpretation fitted in with the counting of the Umayyad Caliphs at twelve and the image that was consequently conveyed of them was that they were leaders who ruled with the support of the umma.

This interpretation was based on several questionable assumptions one of which excluded the first four Caliphs from the counting altogether; then it was assumed that Muʿāwiya was not a usurper of political power; that Marwān b. al-Ḥakam was not to be counted as a Caliph; and that ʿAbd Allāh b. al-Zubayr had been conclusively elected to be the Caliph.\textsuperscript{15}
All of these rather weak interpretations were attempted with the pious yet questionable motive of upholding the reliability of the leading hadith collections, and also to lend support perhaps to the Umayyad rule. The episode sustained itself simply because the chain of transmitters of the hadith in question appeared sound. Al-Bukhārī and Muslim evidently recorded it because of its isnād without paying much attention to its meaning. And then the series of apologetic commentaries followed suit to justify what they had done. If the true purpose of all hadith is to clarify and interpret the Qur’ān and those aspects of Islam that can properly be said to be the necessary part of its belief structure and its Sharī‘a, then the hadith we have just reviewed is so peripheral that it hardly merits all the speculative effort that is undertaken to justify it.

This example also illustrates a situation where a certain imbalance that has remained unchecked at the outset has in turn recreated and perpetuated itself so much so that it became difficult, as time went by, to set it aside.

Another example of a questionable hadith which has found its way into Sahih Muslim is as follows:

Sālim, the mawla (freed slave) of Abū Hudhayfa, was with Abū Hudhayfa and his family at their home. Then Abū Hudhayfa’s wife came to the Prophet, peace be on him, and said that Sālim had become an adult and in possession of his faculties, but he still enters upon us (at our home). I also think that Abū Hudhayfa does not like this. The Prophet then told her: “Suckle him and make him prohibited unto yourself and that would also dispel Abū Hudhayfa’s suspicion.” According to another report she said: “How can I suckle him while he is a grown up man?” The Prophet, peace be on him, smiled and said: “Have you known that he is a grown up man?” Then I went and suckled him and it helped dispel Abū Hudhayfa’s suspicion.18

This is evidently a strange “hadith” despite the fact that Muslim has recorded it on the merit of its chain of transmission. Ibn Qutayba al-Daynūri has also commented that it is a "Sahih hadith",19 with the obvious result that it is lawful for an adult male to suckle a woman’s breast so as to establish a relationship of fosterage with her. This would be a wrong conclusion and the hadith on which it is based also goes against the basic principles of Islam concerning interaction between members of the opposite sexes. The \textit{Sharī'a} proscribes even looking by a man at the body of a woman in order to avert the prospects of illicit relations between them! The correct guideline on this has been set in a ḥadīth of the Prophet where it is proclaimed that “There is no fosterage after the weaning,” (\textit{lā ridā' ba'd al-fiṣāl}) which means that fosterage is confined to early childhood and it discontinues afterwards. Yet it is even more puzzling to note another incredible suggestion by Ibn Qutayba to vindicate the said ḥadīth by saying that “Ṣālim was perhaps a person who had no inclination toward women.”\textsuperscript{26} It has been noted in this connection that there is no ground for recourse to this type of particularisation (\textit{takhlīs}).\textsuperscript{21}

Muhammad al-Ghazālī has also found certain \textit{ahādīth} in the standard collections which are at odds with the Qur‘ān and the examples that he has given are put under the heading of \textit{al-ahādīth al-mardūda} (rejected ḥadīth - al-Ghazālī’s labelling). Included among them are:

a. A ḥadīth narrated by Abū Hurayra and recorded by Muslim and Ibn Māja where the Prophet is quoted to have said:

I beseeched God for permission to grant pardon to my mother, but He did not grant it; then I asked for permission to visit her grave, and He granted me this.\textsuperscript{22} \end{quote}

Al-Ghazālī then wrote that “this ḥadīth is \textit{Shādīdah} (strange) due to its disharmony with the noble Qur‘ān”. God Most High said “We do not punish until We send a Messenger” (al-\textit{Isrā}, 17:15) as He also said in the Qur‘ān: “this is because your Lord does not unjustly destroy villages while its inhabitants are unaware” (al-\textit{An‘ām}, 6:131). With reference to the Arabs, God Most High said in an address to the Prophet “And We did not send to them a Warner before you” (Saba’, 34:44). This is confirmed further “so that you warn a people who have not been warned before you that they may be guided” (al-\textit{Sajdā}, 32:3).

Al-Ghazālī concluded that the Prophet’s mother lived at a time when there was no revealed law for the people of Arabia, nor was the Prophet’s mother warned in any way. She was therefore not liable to punishment on the basis of the clear import of these \textit{āyāt}. This is why the ḥadith, quoted above, which disallowed the seeking of pardon for the mother of the Prophet is in conflict with the Qurʾān. Besides a solitary (Aḥād) hadith does not take priority over the Qurʾān. “This is a clear conclusion without any ambiguity.”

b. In a similar vein, al-Ghazālī has discussed the ḥadith which Imām Ahmad b. Ḥanbal has recorded in his Musnad (vol. 6, p. 269) on the authority of ʿĀʾisha in which she is quoted to have said: “the ʿa[yāt concerning the punishment of stoning and the ten sucklings (which establish maternity on the basis of fosterage) were (written) on a piece of paper under the bed in my house. When the Prophet became ill, we became preoccupied with him, and a domestic animal (meaning a sheep) entered and ate it up.”

Al-Ghazālī here records ʿAbd Allāh al-Ṣiddiq al-Ghumārī’s observation in support of his own view to say that this is odd and condemned without hesitation (shāḏdh, munkar, shāḏid al-nakāra), for the idea of abrogation of the text and ruling (naskh al-tilāwa waʾl-hukm) of which this is the only known example, is impossible. And then the message conveyed in this hardly stands to reason and tends to undermine the integrity of the Qurʾānic text, and God Most High’s clear affirmation therein that “We sent down the remembrance and We shall be its preservers” (al-Ḥijr, 15:9).

c. According to a clear text of the Qurʾān which does not admit any doubt or claim to the contrary, God Most High created the universe in six days, yet a ḥadith has been recorded to the effect that the act of creation took seven days and then the detail that is provided in the said ḥadith is way out of line with the Qurʾān. “Muslim, al-Nasāʾi and others” have thus reported from Abū Hurayra that the Prophet, peace be on him, said: “God created the dust (of the earth) on Saturday, the mountains on Sunday, the trees on Monday, the evil (makrūh) therein on Tuesday, the light on Wednesday, the animals on Thursday, and Adam in the evening of Friday between the ʿasr and the night fall.”

This is contrary to the clear text of the Qurʾān, which is why al-Bukhārī considered it defective and has questioned its accuracy.

Māhmūd Shaltūṭ is critical of what he calls a “strange phenomenon that has become widespread among people,” which is the attribution of tawātur to ahādīth that do not fulfil the conditions of tawātur but have been included in the category of mutawātir because of their diffusion and frequent occurrence in the works of the 'ulamā'. This tendency has found expression in some of the Qur'ān commentaries and works on ḥadīth and history. People have been affected by this tendency so much so that “long lists of names of Companions and Followers, authors and Imāms who are frequently quoted by the ḥadīth transmitters are mentioned, despite the knowledge that the reports in question are weak and cannot stand the test of scrutiny and criticism. Some of these names which are enthusiastically put together are also found in fabricated ahādīth, yet they are quoted nevertheless... so as to mislead the general public and exploit their religious sentiment.”

The proponents of this tendency try hard to show that the reports in question are the words of the Prophet. Since they have been quoted and requoted by many from a large number of Companions and Followers, they become mutawātir without any doubt. “Then anyone who criticises the ḥadīth in question or scrutinises its authenticity is misguided and has deviated from the way of the believers.”

Among the causes of “this phenomenon”, Shaltūt explains, one may be that a particular ḥadīth became well-known in one or two of its links (tabaqāt) which is then assumed for all of its links and the ḥadīth is consequently labelled as mutawātir or mashhūr without due scrutiny and investigation. It is also possible that a ḥadīth has not become well-known at any one of the links or generations but has become the focus of attention by juristic or theological groups, and those who quoted it in support of their position labelled the ḥadīth either as mashhūr or mutawātir and their scholastic literature continued to portray it as such. The fact that the ḥadīth in question was neither of these to begin with was consequently ignored.

Story-tellers and those who occupied themselves with targhib and tarhīb (encouragement and warning) and the narrators of tumults and upheavals (al-malāhim wal-fūān) also played a major role in the labelling of ḥadīth as mutawātir and mashhūr. This has happened not only with regard to doubtful ahādīth but also ḥadīth that was neither sound nor acceptable in the first place. Shaltūt has in this connection quoted a brief statement of the Imām Ahmad b. Hanbal who said that “there are four ahādīth, which circulate among people in towns and bazaars, which have, however, no basis at all (lā ašla laḥā). People who took such ahāḍīth to their hearts had no knowledge of their authenticity nor origin and simply kept repeating them until they became popular. They became careless to the extent of including “weak and even fabricated ahāḍīth” and did not hesitate to designate solitary reports as mutawātīr, and weak ḥadīth as sound and Šāhīh. Shaltūt goes on to specify certain themes such as those of the mahdī, dajjāl, splitting of the moon (inshiqāq al-qamar) in which weak reports have been ascribed the attributes of mashhūr and mutawātīr.²⁹

Ahmad Amin wrote that the upsurge of scholarly activities during the early ‘Abbāsīd period was particularly noted in the collection and compilation of ḥadīth. Ḥadīth scholars were distinguished for their untiring efforts to isolate the weak and doubtful from the reliable narrators of ḥadīth and as a result a careful methodology of ḥadīth criticism was developed. A certain degree of imbalance had, however, set in, as from the early days of this movement, between the external criticism (al-naqād al-khārījī) of the isnād of ḥadīth in which the ḥadīth scholars undoubtedly excelled, and its internal criticism (al-naqād al-dākhili). The subject matter and content of ḥadīth were not scrutinised in the light of the prevailing socio-political realities. This would have helped ascertain the context, for example, concerning ahāḍīth which spoke for or against the ruling dynasties or other partisan movements, and the pressure they might have generated. Had the ḥadīth scholars undertaken internal scrutiny of the text in conjunction with these realities, one would have expected that much of the alleged ḥadīth in the context of personality cult that praised or denigrated individuals, tribes, places and communities would have been verified and isolated at an early stage.³⁰

One other ḥadīth that may be discussed in this connection is related to sectarian developments. The Prophet is thus reported to have said:

My community shall be divided into seventy-three factions, one of them attains salvation and the rest will perish. Then it was asked: which is the one that attains salvation, to which the Prophet said: the ahīl al-summa wa’l-jamā’ (i.e., the mainstream community), “Which one is that? it was asked again, and the Prophet said: the one for which I and my Companions stand.”³¹
Najmi Zanjani, himself a follower of Shi'a Imamiyya, has quoted several commentators, both Sunni and Shi'a, concerning this hadith. He has quoted Ibn Hazm al-Andalusî's Al-Fisal fi'l-Milal ma'l-Ahwâ' ma'l-Nihâl (Kita'îb al-Imân ma'l-Kufr, vol. 3, p. 138) on this and another hadith in which the Prophet is reported to have said that "the Qadariyya (the predecessors of Mu'tazila) and the Murji'a are the Majûs (Magians) of this umma." Ibn Hazm has stated that in addition to being Āhâd, the chains of transmission of both of these two hadith reports are defective.44 Abü'l-Hasan al-Ash'ari (d. 935 AD) has discussed at length the sects and factions in his Maqâlât al-Islâmiyyân and put the main factions at ten but has made no reference to this hadith nor to the much larger number of factions therein.53

Some discrepancy has also been noted in the text of the hadith under review. Al-Shâ'tibi's version of this hadith mentions eighty-two factions (Al-Li'tisâm, vol. II, p. 164) instead of seventy-three, and Abû Ishâq al-Iṣfarâ'i (d. 406 H) (Muqaddimah al-Ṭafsîr, p. 8) has mentioned 72 instead of 73 factions, only one of which will go to Paradise and the rest to Hell. This last report also differs from the standard version in respect of its prognostication of Paradise and Hell: The standard version only mentioned that one will achieve salvation and the rest will perish (halakû). Another discrepancy that is noted in the various versions of the hadith under review concerns the word firqa (faction) which appears in the standard version, and the word milla (nation) which occurs in al-Shâ'tibi's Al-Li'tisâm, and also in al-Baghdaði's Al-Furq bâyn al-Furqâ. Firqa and milla are not the same, but even if one accepts them as synonyms, the discrepancy in the wording of hadith in its various reports still remains.54

The question also arose as to whether the hadith under review conflicts with the Qur'ân, and the point that needs to be borne in mind here is that the Qur'ân emphasises unity, not factionalism. To quote but only three of the relevant verses:

And hold firmly to the cable of God, all of you, and avoid separation (Al 'Imrân, 3:103).

Be steadfast in religion and make no divisions therein. Hard is it for the associators to respond to your call (al-Shûrâ, 42:13).
You share nothing with those who divide in their religion and split off into factions (al-An’aam, 6:159).8

Factionalism and division into groups and sects thus stands in conflict with the Qur’anic emphasis on the unity of the believers.

It is further noted that the hadith in question is not in consonance with historical reality, even if one tries to interpret the hadith in some way. Interpretation has in fact been attempted by those who maintain that the 73 factions refer to the main divisions or sects, but not to the smaller factions and sub-divisions, simply because the smaller factions that are known to history far exceed in number as more than 700 of them have been recorded.

The assertion that there were 73 main factions has also been questioned, since the main theological groups such as the Mu’tazila, Shi’a, Khawarij, Murji’a and Jabriyya, etc., do not exceed eight or ten in number and cannot by any means be put at 73. Even a most liberal counting cannot take the number to 20. This is what writers such as al-Baghdadi, Shahrastani, Ibn Hazm and others have stated and the conclusion is that the hadith under review does not correspond to historical facts.9

Lastly, Zanjani has also noted the tendency among Shi’i writers to place greater emphasis on isnad and the reliability or otherwise of the narrators of hadith and not enough on that of the text and message of the hadith. Zanjani then discusses at length Shaykh Tusi and Sharif Murtada’s writings and concludes that both of these writers have actually conveyed this message and upheld the priority of text (matn) over the sanad (transmission) of hadith.10

It may be added in passing that the Shi’i Imamiyya, who are the largest of the three Shi’a groups, rely mainly on their own collections of hadith. Of the four most well-known Shi’i collections of hadith, Al-Kafi by Ya’qub al-Kulayni (d. 329 H), is followed in order of priority by Ibn Babiwayh al-Qummi’s (better known as al-Saduq) (d. 381 H), Man la Ya’juruh al-Faqih and Al-Tahdhib, as well as al-Istibsar by Shaykh Nasir al-Din al-Tusi (d. 460 H). Al-Kafi is the Shi’i equivalent of Al-Bukhari and contains 16,199 ahdith, whereas al-Qummi has compiled 5,963 ahdith. Al-Tahdhib is the next largest of the four collections containing 13,590 ahdith, and Al-Istibsar has recorded 5,511 ahdith.
The Shi‘i understanding of ǧadīth also differs somewhat to that of their Sunnī counterparts in that the Shi‘is include the sayings of their recognised twelve Imāms in the general body of ǧadīth. Two of these Imāms who feature most prominently in this connection are the fifth and the sixth Imāms, Muḥammad al-Bāqir and Ja‘far al-Ṣādiq.\textsuperscript{38}

Shi‘i scholars have also expressed reservations over the existence of questionable materials in their ǧadīth collections as well as over the reliability of Āḥād ǧadīth in religious matters. They have on the whole maintained that all the obligatory duties of Islam and its injunctions concerning faith and ‘ibāda need to be proven as a matter of certainty either by the authority of the Qur‘ān or the authentic Sunna of the Prophet. The Āḥād ǧadīth can only establish a probability which falls below the level of certainty; it can establish a decisive ruling of the Shari‘a only when it can find confirmation and support in the Qur‘ān.\textsuperscript{39}

The definition of Āḥād ǧadīth in Shi‘i jurisprudence is not different from its Sunnī definition. Āḥād is thus a ǧadīth which has not reached the level of continuous testimony or tawātūr even if it is narrated by several narrators, say five or six, but still falls below the level of Mutawātīr. Only the Mutawātīr can establish positive knowledge on its own. There may be some differences of opinion among individual Shi‘i scholars on the authority of Āḥād, yet the majority Shi‘i opinion is that no one may take a decisive stand in matters of religion on the basis only of Āḥād ǧadīth unless there be supportive circumstantial evidence to confirm its authenticity and truth.\textsuperscript{40}

Yūsuf al-Qaraḍāwī has drawn attention to weak ǧahādīth in the category especially of encouragement and warning (al-targhib wa‘l-tarhib) that do not, on the whole, contain specific rulings (ahkām) but are nevertheless a cause for concern. This is because the ‘ulamā’ of ǧadīth have generally been less critical of this type of ǧadīth, which has in turn tended to undermine the reliability of ǧadīth generally. Although the ‘ulamā’ of ǧadīth have specified certain conditions for admissibility of this type of ǧadīth, even so, an uncritical acceptance of such ǧadīth can be seen in books and chapters on moral teachings, spirituality and mysticism.\textsuperscript{41} Al-Qaraḍāwī then draws attention to the fact that works on Qur‘ān exegesis (tafsīr) are also not free of weak hadith and even forgeries on such themes as superiority and virtue of the chapters and verses of the Qur’ān. Even though much work has been done by leading scholars who have either isolated such aḥādīth or declared them null and void, Qur’ān commentators “such as al-Zamakhshari, al-Tha‘alibi, al-Bayḍāwī, Ismā‘īl Ḥaqqī and others have persisted in quoting fabrications in the name of ḥadīth—aṣarrū ‘alā ikhrāj al-ḥadīth al-makhdūb.”12 Al-Qaraḍāwī also refers to al-Alūsī, the author of another well-known Tafsīr (i.e. Rūḥ al-Bayān) who openly comes out (at the end of his commentary on sūra al-Tawba) in defence of al-Zamakhshari and al-Bayḍāwī, saying that the aḥādīth on preaching and warning are either sound, weak, or fabricated. If they are sound, there is not an issue to address, but if they are weak of isnād then “the muḥaddithūn have agreed that weak ḥadīth may be acted upon in regard to tārīghīb and ṭarīḥīb...”. Even with reference to fabricated ḥadīth, al-Alūsī takes a surprisingly weak position and tends to vindicate those who spoke in support of the superiority and virtues of the verses of the Qur’ān; they may have resorted to lying but if their purpose was to encourage people to the path of God and adherence to His laws, then this may be said to be a permissible form of lying. This is the upshot of a long passage that al-Qaraḍāwī has quoted concerning al-Alūsī’s exegesis and then followed it with the following remark: “This is very strange coming from a person who counts himself among commentators of the Book of God. Some have also described him as a faqīh and usūlī. What kind of faqīh is this where all one finds is ignorance of the very fundamentals of what is upheld by the ‘ulamā’ of distinction?”13 Al-Qaraḍāwī then quotes a number of prominent ‘ulamā’ including al-Bukhārī and Muslim, as well as Ibn Ḥazm al-Zāhirī, Ibn Rajab al-Ḥanbālī and the Mālikī Ibn al-‘Arabī as well as modern experts on ḥadīth, Ahmad Muḥammad Shākir and Muhammad Nāṣir al-Dīn al-‘Albānī—all to the effect that ḥadīth of all kinds is subject to the same requirements of authenticity and standards of scrutiny, regardless as to whether its subject matter is concerned with moral teachings or the aḥkām, and that only the Ṣaḥīh and Hasan ḥadīth may be accepted.

In the concluding remarks in his book Kayfa Nata‘āmal Ma‘a al-Sunna al-Nabawiyya (How should we treat the Sunna of the Prophet) al-Qaraḍāwī has stressed the need for compilation of no less than three encyclopaedias on ḥadīth. The first of these is to compile a comprehensive encyclopaedia on the narrators of hadith (mawsu‘a shāmila li-rijāl al-hadīth) and their biographies which is inclusive and exhaustive of all of the hadith narrators. Anyone who has been described and identified, whether as trustworthy or weak, including even the fabricators and liars should be included.

A second encyclopaedia is then proposed for the textual subject matter of hadith, including their chains of transmission, whether one or more. The work should again be comprehensive and exhaustive of all hadith that is attributed to the Prophet, everything in the Sunna that is available in documented materials from the beginning down to the latter third of the fifth century of the hijra.

Al-Qarāḍāwī continued to propose the third of his three-tiered proposal which brings to a conclusion and represents the basic objective of the first two projects. The third encyclopaedia that is proposed here is devoted exclusively to the Sahīh and Ḥasan aḥādīth, which are derived from the other two collections proposed above in accordance with the strict and scientific criteria that have been laid down for this purpose by the leading hadith scholars and researchers of the past, and those among contemporary experts that enjoy the trust and confidence of the umma.

The three encyclopaedias that are proposed, al-Qarāḍāwī added, should be compiled with the new methods of classification and should have a comprehensive index. They should be compiled in line with the overriding objective of providing the basic tools and a source of benefit for research in all spheres of religion, social sciences and humanities, and practically all areas of knowledge that are addressed by the Sunna.
All of this should be done with the aid of modern facilities, especially the computer, which is now a source of great benefit and enables the contemporary generation to aim at levels of accomplishment that their predecessors were not able to achieve, nor even to think of achieving.44

Having advanced these proposals, al-Qarāḍāwī then expresses the hope that the Centre for Research in Sunna and Sira (CRSS) (Markaz Buḥūth al-Sunna wa‘l-Sira) of Qatar, of which al-Qarāḍāwī himself is the Director, will be able to cooperate with similar other institutions toward making these proposals a reality.45 In an earlier reference to the need to isolate the Sahīh and Ḥasan hadith from the weak hadīth, al-Qaraḍāwī noted that “this was what actually prompted me to compile a verified compendium (al-Muntaqā) of Sahih and Hasan aḥādith in two volumes that was published by the CRSS of Qatar.” This work seems to be confined, however, to the study of a particular collection, namely that of al-Mundhiri’s Al-Tarqhiḥ wa’l-Tarbiḥ and does not, as such, address the wider proposals that al-Qaraḍāwī has advanced on the compilation of encyclopaedias of ḥadith.46

Al-Qaraḍāwī ends the two-page conclusion of his book with yet another suggestion which is that the Sunna is in need of “new commentaries (al-Sunna fi ḥāja ilā sharīh jadīda) so as to clarify the facts, elucidate the complexities, and rectify the concepts, refute the doubts and false attributions.” All of this should be written in the current language of the people and address their contemporary concerns.47 He refers in this connection to Qur’ān commentaries that have been written by some of the prominent ‘ulamā of the twentieth century such as Muḥammad Rashid Rida, Jamāl al-Dīn al-Qāsimi, Tāhir b. ‘Āshūr, Abū’l Āḍā Mawdūdī, Sayyid Qūṭb and Mahmūd Shaltūt, whose valuable endeavours advanced the knowledge of the Qur’ān to a new stage. This is also needed, al-Qaraḍāwī adds, with regard to the Sunna, especially with reference to al-Bukhārī and Muslim. Although some efforts have already been made by the ‘ulamā of India and Pakistan who wrote commentaries on the four works of Sunna, but “they are on the whole dominated by the imitative trend of conventional methods and do not address the concerns of contemporary minds.”48

The present writer believes that the methodology that the ‘ulamā of ḥadith have developed for the authentication of ḥadith is basically adequate, although new methods of research, documentation and classification that are now available due to better facilities could be utilised to great advantage. If a new project along the lines suggested above were to be undertaken, the work that is proposed would be mainly in the nature of sifting through, critical evaluation, and consolidation of the existing compilations of ḥadith. The ḥadith critics and writers on Mawdūʿāt have already carried out works which would facilitate the task to some extent. But once again since the Mawdūʿāt were themselves compiled long after al-Bukhārī and Muslim, they remain unconsolidated and separate. It may therefore be worthwhile to propose that a panel of experts in ḥadīth, tafsīr, history, and fiqh should be set up, within the framework of the Organisation of Islamic Conference or such other national or international bodies as might be able and interested to undertake the proposed task. Once a project is created, along the lines of al-Qaraḍāwī’s suggestions, and assigned for implementation, it would be in order to suggest that the panel of experts take into consideration the prevailing conditions and realities of the Muslim community, especially in the sphere of legal injunctions (ahkām) and the need for uniformity and consensus on the basis of a comprehensive and conveniently accessible collection of ḥadīth. This might mean a separate collection of ḥadīth al-ahkām that could be utilised as a reference work on Shari‘a-related themes by jurists, legislators and judges. My own proposal on this, which I made at an International Conference on ḥadīth (held by the University of London’s School of Oriental and African Studies in 1998) was basically focused on a critical review and consolidation of the existing collections with a view to compiling an abridged and purified version of the reliable ḥadīth from the six major collections. I had occasion to reflect on that proposal further and find that the two proposals are different only on minor points. I am now unifying my proposal with al-Qaraḍāwī’s suggestions with respect to the encyclopaedic collections that he suggested on ḥadīth. This is evidently a wider proposition and would naturally require greater allocation of resources and commitment, yet I now feel that a thorough review and comprehensive approach along the lines al-Qaraḍāwī has suggested is preferable and would naturally command greater credibility. This is truly a challenging task but it is necessary if one is to hope for setting aside, hopefully once and for all, the incessant controversy that has persisted over the authenticity of ḥadīth and accuracy of its text, message and purpose. If I were to suggest an adjustment in the conventional methodology of ḥadīth criticism, it would be to pay balanced attention to the verification of both the isnād and matn, and not to the one at the expense of the other. Greater attention would thus have to be paid to the question of internal harmony between the Sunna itself and then of the Sunna with the Qur’ān, and also the broad and general principles of Shari‘a that are derived from the overall reading of these sources.
As for the reference al-Qaraḍāwī has made to the need for commentaries and hermeneutics on ḥadīth that seek to advance the understanding of ḥadīth from the viewpoint of contemporary conditions, this should be taken into consideration as a step beyond the compilation of the suggested encyclopaedic works, in conjunction perhaps with the specialised collection I proposed on legal aḥādīth. But the actual writing of such commentaries should, for practical reasons of not diluting the focus of the main project, not be made a part of the basic project on ḥadīth compilation. This second proposal may be the kind of work that expert institutions of higher learning and individual scholars can take up over a longer period, or even be made the subject of a new project after the proposed encyclopaedic works have been accomplished. The wider project that is undertaken as a result should naturally draw on the best expertise and resources as are available at the dawn of the 21st century so that it becomes a source of inspiration and invigorated learning for the generations of Muslims to come. It would, in my opinion, be an act of outstanding academic and spiritual merit and a most valuable service that Islamic scholarship can give to the umma of the 21st century. What is proposed to be undertaken in this way would bear credible resemblance to the third Caliph 'Uthmān’s initiative so long ago for the authentication of the text of the Qur‘ān and the decision which he consequently took to validate only the authentic text to the exclusion of all the variant versions of the Holy Book. For the purpose solely of uniformity, the Caliph actually issued orders that all the variant versions of the Qur‘ān be burnt and destroyed. Depending on the nature of the result, participation and support that is realised for this project, one may even be able, in due course, to invoke the support of general consensus (ijmā‘) for it provided that the explicit approval of the learned councils, academies, and individuals in the Muslim world is duly solicited and obtained.
